MY DEAR CHILDREN, (3886)

CHARLOTTE LOUISA,
PETER, ANNA AGNES, JOHN ANTES, CHARLES JOSEPH, BENJAMIN FREDERIC.

MY DEAR CHILDREN,

IT was at your particular request, that I wrote the following circumstantial account of my visit to SOUTH AFRICA. Knowing, how deeply interested you felt in every thing relating to your Father, and that the summary account of my proceedings, contained in letters, would not satisfy you, I was encouraged, under all circumstances, to persevere.

I did not then expect to be called upon to publish this Journal, which, though now given to the Public, I yet consider as dedicated to you. If its publication requires any apology, I am sure, that you will admit any that I can make, either for its style, its details, want of arrangement, occasional repetitions, or the freedom with which I have stated to you my sentiments and opinions on various subjects.

My official report was immediately sent to those to whom it belonged; but as you all delight in the success of the service in which I was engaged, I have introduced a pretty full account both of the external construction, and internal state, of a Mission of the United Brethren among the Heathen.

Receive it, therefore, as a mark of my paternal affection, and as a testimony of my gratitude to GOD, for having blessed me with children, whose filial duty, love and confidence, I have hitherto uninterruptedly enjoyed, and of whom I may cherish that firm trust, that they are not only MY children, but "THE CHILDREN OF GOD, BY FAITH IN CHRIST JESUS."

C. I. LATROBE.

P R E F A C E.

THE Directors of the Missions among Heathen nations, established by the Church, known by the name of Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren, having been frequently requested by the missionaries at Gnadenthal and Groenekloof, near the Cape of Good Hope, to send a person, duly authorized, to visit those settlements, I was appointed to that service; and, on my return, delivered in an official report of my transactions. I have, however, been desired by many well-wishers to the Missions, and others, to publish the following narrative, originally written for the information of my family and friends.

ONE object of my visit was to assist in making some arrangement with the Government of the Colony regarding the security of the Missionary Settlements of the United Brethren.

THE beneficial influence of Christianity in enlightening and civilizing Heathen nations, of which the Mission among the Hot-tentots at the Cape furnished the most convincing proofs, being generally acknowledged, Government had expressed a wish, that a third Settlement, under the superintendence of the Brethren, might be made in the interior; and condescended to give the necessary directions and powers for fixing upon a spot of ground, as yet unoccupied, and suitable for that purpose. On that account, it was desirable, that a journey should be made through the Colony, in search of a convenient situation, if existing circumstances favoured the undertaking.

THOUGH I felt myself insufficient for the execution of a commission so extensive, and so important to the concerns of our Church and Missions, yet I ventured to accept the call, in reliance on the help of God, to whose service I count it the greatest favour, honour, and pleasure, to be enabled to devote all the powers of soul and body; and comforted by the conviction, that in all things, "our sufficiency is of God."

THIS Journal was written, as leisure or hurry, rest or weariness, quietude or interruption, or other contingencies and dispositions of mind permitted; yet always with strict attention to truth, and a desire to avoid misrepresentation.

THE drawings, from which the accompanying plates have been executed, were all made on the spot, and I may venture to affirm, that they are scrupulously exact in their outline, showing the character of the country, as far as I have penetrated into it.

I LAY no claim to those qualifications, which are required, if the only object of the journey be the improvement of science; but, being habitually attentive to subjects connected with geology, mineralogy, and botany, some account of them will be found in the course of this narrative, though I had frequent occasion to regret, that my acquaintance with them was not sufficient, to enable me to enter upon scientific description. To my friend, J. W. Burchell, Esq. I am indebted for the scientific names, added to the subjoined list. The best information on these subjects may be found in the works of Sparmann, Barrow, Lichtenstein, Burchell, and others; nor will the Colony ever want men of ability, ready to explore its widely extended regions, while it is in possession of a Government, ever attentive, not only to the promotion of moral and political good within its own dominion, but to the distribution of the benefits of its discoveries to all mankind.

CHAPTER I.

Various Occurrences and Remarks during the Voyage to the Cape of Good Hope.

ON the first of October 1815, at eight in the morning, we left Gravesend with a fair wind and fine weather, and in the evening came to an anchor in Margate roads, to await the return of the tide.

On the 2d early we proceeded, and were fortunate enough to get round the South Foreland, with a fair breeze at north-west. The clearness of the weather gave us a good view of the coasts of England and France as we passed between Dover and Calais, and the state of the wind permitting our keeping near our own shores, we were much gratified by the appearance of the rocks, headlands, towns, and villages, as they successively presented themselves to view.

3d. The wind veered round to the south-west, and towards night rose considerably. The motion of the ship became troublesome, but as our captain was determined, if possible, to keep the sea, every exertion was used by tacking and otherwise, to proceed against contrary winds.

Passing by the Isle of Wight on the 4th, the wind had so much increased, that but for a providential shift in our favour, we should have been compelled to put into some port. Notwithstanding the unpleasant situation, in which, as persons unaccustomed to the sea, we found ourselves placed, and a secret wish to be delivered from it, our desire to proceed was so great, that we all thanked God, that we had met with so good a sea-boat, keeping so close to the wind, and so determined and skilful a conductor. The wind abating towards morning, we soon forgot the troubles of the night, and spent the

5th. Mostly on deck. In the afternoon, however, the weather assumed a more unfavourable appearance, and threatened a stormy night. Until two in the morning it blew hard. I staid on deck, beholding with astonishment the foaming surface of the troubled ocean, till the violent rain drove me down. I cannot deny, that in the mind of a landsman, the pleasure, occasioned by the novelty and magnificence of such an exhibition, is intermixed with some degree of fear, often amounting to an apprehension of danger, where in fact there is no sufficient cause. As it was in my cabin that I found my imagination most active in conjuring up these needless perplexities, my station in rough weather during the whole voyage was chiefly on deck, where the courage and skill of the captain, and frequent conversation with him and our fellow-passenger Mr. Buck, who generally kept me company, dissipated all fears. The Start point was the last land we saw through the misty atmosphere, and I now took leave, for the present, of dear Old England, with a comfortable assurance in my mind, that by God's mercy, I should return to it in safety. This assurance never forsook me during the whole time of my absence, and I mention it with peculiar thankfulness, as it kept me always cheerful and contented, whether at sea or on land, and free from those misgivings, which, though considered as the mere work of imagination, often affect our peace and happiness even more than real evils.

6th. Though we had all pretty well recovered from sea sickness, yet with me, it left behind a total want of appetite, which during the whole voyage, prevented my partaking of much food.

But though after some time, I felt myself weakened in body by such abstinence, I partly ascribe to it that degree of liveliness which I preserved in my mind, and the pleasure I took, in being constantly occupied with reading or writing. It was not till after this day, that we could make some regular arrangement as to family worship, most of us having been hitherto too often confined to our cabins, to allow of our meeting together. From this time, immediately after breakfast, we read the portions of Scripture appointed in our Church for each day, and sang some verses in connection with their contents, offering up praise and prayer to Him, "Whose eyes run to and fro throughout the whole earth, to show Himself strong in the behalf of them whose heart is perfect towards Him." Every evening we met for the same purpose, and on festivals and memorial-days called to mind our fellowship with our Brethren at home and abroad, by a short address delivered to the company on the subject of commemoration. Besides the daily worship, we met regularly on Sundays about ten o'clock in the morning, when we read the Litany, and heard a discourse, either read or delivered by a missionary, with suitable hymns, as usual in our congregations. On these occasions our hearts were often filled with renewed comfort and confidence, and we may truly bear witness to the fulfilment of our Saviour's gracious promise given unto his disciples, and to all them, "Who, through their word should believe on Him," that, "where two or three are met in His name, He will be in the midst of them, even unto the end of the world." And not only when thus assembled, but when we entered into our closets and directed our prayers and supplications to our heavenly Father in secret, we experienced of a truth, that His mercies are not confined to time and place and form, but that He hears and answers all, who in every place, and under any circumstances, call upon and worship Him in sincerity and truth. We not only met with no interruption from the captain, the crew, and our fellow-passenger, but rather with every degree of attention and indulgence; nor were we ever prevented by the state of the weather from regularly attending to the daily service.

I had provided myself with an assortment of books, some of which I had not had leisure to read at home, and to-day, began to examine my stock and put them in order in my cabin. The first parcel I opened contained several pamphlets, chiefly German, sent to me by my friend, Mr. Ackerman, for the amusement of the company. Most of them related to the political affairs of Germany, the battle of Leipsic, &c. containing much interesting information, recent and important, though the late escape of Bonaparte from Elba, his invasion of France, first successes and final overthrow at Waterloo, has placed even the great events of 1813 and 1814 in the back ground of the picture. But who that considers the dealings of God with mankind, can contemplate the events of the last five-and-twenty years, without being humbled under His mighty hand, and giving to Him alone all the glory of our deliverance. To him who thus reads the history of the late wars, it will prove a useful lesson.

While we were in the channel and in the bay, vessels of various descriptions were continually in sight, but we now seemed left alone.

9th. A shoal of porpoises surrounded the ship. They were passing from west to east, and amused us much by their playfulness and the astonishing swiftness of their motions. They are said to be forerunners of a storm. Towards evening the wind rose, with frequent drizzling showers and flying black clouds. It increased so much, that the appearance of the sea after sunset became rather terrific. The waves frequently broke over the forepart of the ship, and sometimes even approached us, as we sat on the quarter-deck. For above two hours the moon shone bright, every now and then seeming to step behind some dark swift-flying cloud, and to come forth again with redoubled lustre. The foaming edges of the waves appear at a distance like long lines of phosphoric light, chasing each other, and whenever a wave dashes over the decks, the sparks it contains run with the water to and fro, as the ship rolls from side to side. About eleven o'clock, assistance was called for in the cabin, as the trunks and other articles had broken loose and were sliding backwards and forwards on the floor. The door of the pigstye being forced open, the poor animals ran in great consternation backwards and forwards on deck, and one having the misfortune to fall headlong down the cabin stairs, the noise of its fall and its cries added to the terror of the scene. The wind however being fair, we were thankful, amidst all the restlessness occasioned by the ship's motion, that we were getting fast forward.

10th and 11th were tolerably quiet days, but on the 12th the wind turned against us, and though above 240 miles off the coast of Portugal, the captain thought it unsafe to proceed farther towards the south-east, the direction in which we were then steering, and towards evening tacked and stretched towards the north-west, the wind from the southward rising, and every now and then squalls with rain increasing its force. The sea was now in a terrible ferment and assailed the ship on all sides, but particularly from the north-west, from whence a heavy swell came rolling towards us in tremendous surges. We ran under close-reefed topsails, keeping as near as possible to the wind, against a head-sea; but at two in the morning the wind shifting, put about again and kept on our course. The morning turned out fine, and a very large shoal of porpoises played about the ship.

When I sometimes sit on deck, surveying this immeasurable deep, I think, Surely, He that made the sea and all that is therein, did not intend that it should be only the playground of the many different tribes of fishes that flit through its upper regions and skim along its surface, but the habitation also of innumerable creatures of His hand, that walk upon its bottom, probably with shapes, properties and powers, unknown to us. I am ready to exclaim with the Psalmist, "O Lord! how manifold are Thy works! In wisdom hast Thou made them all: The earth is full of Thy riches.

“ So is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts.” Ps. CIV. 24, 25. It is well for them, that we have not discovered the means of hauling them up, to make their heads, bodies and tails assist in furnishing the tables of our citizens with new dainties. They, at least, live undisturbed by that devourer-general, Man. His pretension is vain, to claim the dominion over all the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea! That dominion was given to him in his state of innocence, before death came into the world by sin. Then indeed all inferior creatures looked up to him with love, respect, and willing subjection, as to a friend and patron. But now the first question commonly asked by a child, when it sees or hears of any living creature, walking, flying, or swimming, is, “ Is it good to eat?” Many commentators seem to have entirely forgotten, that by the fall of man he lost his dominion over other creatures, and when the Lord repeats the declaration of His will concerning man after the flood, speaks no more of dominion, but of “ the dread of man” upon them, with permission to use them for food.

During the following days, the weather was calm, and the rolling of the ship, occasioned by the north-west swell, proved very unpleasant. We were engaged in preparing letters to send home by any passing ship we might meet.

15th early, a sloop hove in sight, which turned out to be a Dane, bound from Malaga to some Danish port. The captain went on board, committed our letters to the master, and made an exchange of some hollands for melons and raisins, which as our stock of fresh provisions was low, was of service to us.

Reading Miller’s Life of Huet, a French bishop in the seventeenth century, I found the following passage, which, perfectly according with the sentiments of every true Protestant Christian, I hope I shall not be blamed for inserting a translation of it. The venerable prelate, speaking of some works, written by him in the monastery of Aunay, proceeds—“ But long before I occupied myself with “ these subjects, I had conceived a much more important under“ taking, to which, indeed, more than to any thing else, all my “ studies and contemplations hitherto had a reference. This was “ an Exposition and Elucidation of the Holy Scriptures. From “ my childhood, such a veneration for its divine origin, and such a “ high estimation of the worth and internal excellence of this book “ had taken root within me, that, though my youthful spirit de“ lighted and almost revelled in the beauties of the fine arts and “ the mathematics, it always returned with pleasure to these sa“ cred records, as feeling itself in them at home, and in the former “ only as a wanderer and pilgrim. And yet, at that time, I had “ no knowledge of the Hebrew language, and could not extend my “ research beyond the narrow limits of the vulgate. But having “ broken through these bounds, and, as it were, standing at the “ fountain itself, my soul felt an increasing relish for this study, and “ I believed, that I now saw the mysteries of heaven without a veil.

“ My increasing and more intimate acquaintance with those sa“ cred books convinced me, that, even if they were not of divine “ origin, which faith teaches us to believe them to be, and which “ we know by internal conviction, yet both their antiquity and the “ immense number of extraordinary, mighty, and marvellous sub“ jects, which are to be found in this inexhaustible treasury, and “ no where else, render them worthy, that we should devote all our “ care, diligence, meditations, and nightly lucubrations, to the stu“ dy and understanding of them alone. Being, therefore, now re“ leased from the bondage of the court, I again betook myself to “ the study of the Hebrew, combining with it that of the Syriac
“ and Arabic, and because the knowledge of languages requires “ long and repeated exercise, I never suffered one day to pass, be“ tween the years 1681 and 1712 without employing one or two “ hours upon it, being a period of thirty-one years; nor did I ever “ suffer business, journies, or even illness to interfere with this re“ solution. Thus, during that period of time, I have read the whole “ Old Testament four-and-twenty times, with the greatest delight, “ and essential benefit to my soul.”—This worthy man was a devoted Roman Catholic, and speaks with the greatest gratitude of St. Genevieve, by whose kind intercession he was restored from a dangerous illness, and to whom also, when he first took orders, he commended himself for assistance in a faithful discharge of his priestly office, by reading his first mass at her tomb, in a vault of her church at Paris. Thus, the most excellent and enlightened men of the age, such as Huet was, in his day and station, may, in certain points, remain quite in the dark, till the Spirit of God, by a progressive work, grants the rays of his light and truth to shine upon them. Such reflections should make us more candid and forbearing, in judging of the state of men's minds in other persuasions, differing from our own, conscious that we ourselves have yet much to learn, before we attain to perfection.

17th. Two vessels hove in sight. The first hoisted English colours, and we edged towards her. She proved to be a Poole ship from Newfoundland, bound to Valencia in Spain. Mr. Buck, being a native of Poole, found an acquaintance in her captain, and gave him some very welcome information concerning his family, a circumstance which afforded us all much pleasure. This morning I began to read Montgomery's "World before the Flood." There is a strain of genuine piety in it, which cannot fail to edify all unprejudiced readers. I see no reason for his making such an humble apology for the fiction.

18th. Flying fish made their first appearance, and as on that account it was hoped that dolphins were not far off, in pursuit of these defenceless creatures, we prepared with great eagerness of expectation to revenge the cause of the pursued, by an attack on the pursuers; in which, however, we were disappointed, for not a single fish approached the ship. The wind was contrary, and we made but little way.

19th. In the forenoon, a shoal of bonettas kept for some time playing about the ship, and many attempts were made to strike them, but in vain. In the afternoon, a large turtle was observed, asleep, and floating close to the ship. The jolly-boat was immediately lowered down, and the captain and two sailors set off with all speed after her, but by some mismanagement missed their snatch, and she escaped.

I read to-day a well-written characteristic of count Zinzendorf in manuscript. The author, Mr. Loretz, sent me this piece about twenty-five years ago, together with Miller's life of that nobleman, which, but for its tiresome digressions, I should have read with pleasure. He wished me to furnish an English translation; but the want of leisure, and a consciousness of my inability to do justice to the subject, induced me to decline it. I should, however, think myself highly favoured, at a proper time, and in a satisfactory manner, to contribute to rescue the memory of so great and excellent a man as count Zinzendorf from that unmerited obloquy, which has been cast upon him by base and wicked enemies, and too often repeated by persons misguided or misinformed. The apologies made for various expressions in his writings, which appear eccentric, or even incorrect, seem to have satisfied most objectors on the continent, but in England have not as yet been much attended to.

20th. Certain rocks, marked in our charts as lying to the north of Porto Santo, and called the eight stones, were to-day an object of some anxiety to the captain; and though their existence is not fully proved, he kept a sharp look out for them by night and day. Our dead reckoning was by this time so much at variance with the chronometer, that by the captain's account, there was a hundred, and by the mate's, no less than a hundred and forty miles difference between them.

On the 21st, the island of Madeira appearing far to the westward, established the truth of the chronometer's reckoning, to the great satisfaction of the captain. We moved on but slowly, with light breezes. The time, however, passed pleasantly, as I was continually employed in reading, writing, or agreeable and interesting conversation with my fellow passengers. This evening I finished reading Risler's life of the Rev. August Gottlieb Spangenberg, a bishop of our Church. As we are apt to compare ourselves with those, of whose life and character we read a description, more especially if there be some degree of similarity in our professions and occupations, I cannot help confessing, that this narrative led me into a train of reflection, very humbling to my own heart. Compared to this extraordinary man, I sink into nothing! What indefatigable application of all the energies and powers of soul and body, even from his earliest years, to acquire knowledge of every kind! What eagerness to explore the truth; and what zeal and fortitude in practising that which he had gained in theory! And when he had found JESUS to be that Glorious Being, "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," with what full purpose of heart did he not "count all things but as dung and dross, for the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus, and Him crucified!" How strictly did he watch over himself, and seek in all things, by word and work, to glorify the name of his Saviour! He was, indeed, a pattern and ensample to the flock. While I admired him, in all his principles and practice, and in the multiplicity of his labours in the Lord's vineyard, I could not help recollecting with much regret, that I did not better improve the acquaintance I was favoured to have with so distinguished a servant of God, during my residence at Barby from 1776 to 1779, when, on account of the friendship he bore to my grandfather, H. Antes in Pennsylvania, and to my late excellent father, he showed particular attention to me. But though I highly respected him, I did not then know how sufficiently to appreciate the inestimable value of the notice and counsel of such a man. He also honoured me with his correspondence, after my return to England; until his departure out of this world, in his 90th year, deprived our Church of one of its most distinguished ministers.

22d. Between three and four in the morning, the watch announced the approach of a schooner, which, on hailing, proved to be an American, bound to Boston. The captain and Mr. Buck went on board and purchased some boxes of raisins. The weather was remarkably fine and bright, but calm. The sailors call this preliminary state of calms and baffling winds, previous to entering into the regular trade-winds, the dolldrums, from which we prayed, that we might soon be delivered.

24th. At daybreak, land was discovered towards the south-east, being the Salvages, generally considered as belonging to the Madeira islands. They are uninhabited. The rocks, called Piton rocks, were likewise in sight. The highest of them is a square-looking jagged precipice, connected by a dangerous reef, with two others, which stand singly, and are not so much elevated. At noon, a strange sail appeared in sight, under Spanish colours. We shaped our course towards her, and Mr. Buck conveyed some letters on board. She proved to be the Constantia from Lancerota, one of the Canaries, bound to Ireland for provisions. In the evening, the Peak of Teneriffe was seen, bearing south-south-east, but surrounded with clouds. Towards night, Brother Clemens was seized with a violent spasm; the pain of which increasing, exceedingly alarmed us. As he was convinced from former experience, that nothing but bleeding would relieve him, Brother Stein took courage to perform the operation; and though it was the first time he attempted it, without the direction of a surgeon*, it pleased God to give him success, and the patient was soon relieved from immediate danger, though several days were required to complete his recovery. We all felt truly thankful to our Almighty Preserver, to whom our prayers were directed for help in so distressing and dangerous an emergency.

25th. Flying clouds and squalls seemed to announce a change of weather, and deliverance from the calms we had hitherto suffered.

* It is usual with the Brethren, that when Missionaries are sent abroad, some instruction is given respecting the treatment of patients of different descriptions, and the use of medicines. Brother Stein had thus acquired considerable skill in several branches of surgery, which proved useful on many occasions.

Whenever it cleared up, the Peak of Teneriffe, at about eighty miles distance, appeared beautifully lodged among clouds passing along its middle and lower region. Palma, another of the Canary islands, was also in sight; but our hopes of a change disappeared towards evening, and, except two or three light breezes of short duration, the calm continued. The appearance of the sky at sunset was marvellously grand. Large masses of clouds, in lines, shaded with a bright bluish grey colour, showing through various openings the brilliant orange, purple, and greenish tints of the unclouded atmosphere beyond them, hovered above the western horizon, which, down to the edge of the sea, glowed with the most vivid gold and crimson hue. This grand picture was reflected by numberless short rippling waves, as far as the eye could reach. Above the dark mass of clouds a bright purple tinged the heavens as high as the zenith. All seemed stationary and silent, no wind whatever accompanying the clouds. In these latitudes, we had frequently a similar display of beauty in the evening sky.

26th. A breeze sprung up, but not in our favour. We tacked to the north-west and south-east all day. The islands were beclouded; though now and then Teneriffe with its Peak shewed itself partially uncovered. The heat was excessive, but the breeze made it bearable. I was engaged in reading a German translation of Barrow's account of his travels through the Cape colony, which, as formerly, afforded me much pleasure and instruction. He has made honourable mention of our settlement at Bavian's Kloof, now called Gnadenthal, which in 1798 was yet in its infancy. To a botanist, his work is peculiarly valuable.

28th. We passed so close to the westward of Palma, that we could distinctly discern every object on shore. When the day dawned, its summit was covered with thick morning clouds and vapours. As they ascended or withdrew, the precipitous declivities of the mountains and rocks opened to view. The sun, rising behind the island, soon dispelled the clouds, and illumined its upper regions, the outline of which exhibited rocky ridges and glens, apparently stony and barren; but towards the west, much wood covers the more gentle slopes. Two promontories form a small bay, with a fruitful coast, a town and landing place. The road is unsafe in westerly winds. About noon, we were again becalmed, while a sail to windward enjoyed a delightful breeze.

29th. During the night, we had made some progress, and but for baffling winds in the vicinity of these islands, should now have reaped the benefit of the trade-wind. After breakfast, a heavy squall came on from the west, with violent rain, which put us in considerable motion. When it subsided, we held our usual Sunday's worship, but had hardly finished, when we were assailed by another squall, more lasting than the former. Above two hundred gallons of rain-water were collected, and the ducks being let out of their coops, enjoyed a splashing. There was now a sufficient quantity of water for all our live stock, which hitherto had been served rather too sparingly, considering the heat of the weather. This last squall brought on a fresh north-east breeze, and our captain began to hope, that we had at length gained the trade-wind. All sails were set, and we proceeded with great swiftness, overtaking a large bark and a brig, the former English and the latter Portuguese: towards sun-set, our hopes again proved vain; the wind veered round to the south, and dark clouds rose, with much lightning, in the western quarter.

30th. The western horizon appeared uncommonly gloomy, and an almost incessant deep roar of thunder threatened an approaching storm. After some doubt as to the course the clouds would take, they began to rise swiftly towards us. All hands were summoned on deck, and the ship prepared to meet the worst; but the storm was more terrific in its approach than in its presence. The sea was indeed for some time extremely agitated, and rose in considerable waves. Some strong flashes of lightning, accompanied by thunder not very loud, illumined our cabin, into which the heavy rain had driven us; but in about an hour, the wind fell, and we were yet more annoyed by the return of the old calm, when the ship, becoming unmanageable by the rudder, was pushed about in any direction the swell gave her. Immediately after sunset, it began again to lighten all round the horizon.

31st. We made good way with a favourable wind till noon, when it again fell calm.

I had been so much pleased with the second little volume of Risler's Select Narratives, containing an account of the Spirit of the Church of the United Brethren, immediately after its renovation in 1722, that I resolved to translate it into English.

In the evening, and during the whole night, it lightened incessantly. I sat long on deck, very much delighted with the grandeur of the scene.

November 1st. I began to-day to read such parts of the Spectator as appeared to me most interesting.

Addison certainly had a religious feeling, and now and then expresses himself with truth and effect upon religious subjects: but I cannot help remarking, that, had he possessed a clearer view of the great price, paid by our Saviour to redeem us from the vain conversation received by tradition from our forefathers, which is full of sin, and leads to sin and the love of the world, he would, in many of his papers, have avoided subjects and discussions tending only to excite those passions in the human breast, which had better be kept dormant. Indeed, as a principal party engaged in that work, he may be considered accountable for the whole of what his associates have said in their different essays. Often, however, much instruction on religious topics, may be gained from the perusal of his writings. I was particularly struck and pleased with the conclusion of a paper, written against vulgar prejudices and superstitions, by which foolish and idle people frequently torment their brains. I cannot help transcribing it: "I have, (says he), but one way of fortifying my soul against those gloomy presages and terrors of mind; and that is, by securing to myself the friendship and protection of that Being, who disposes of events, and governs futurity. He sees at one view the whole thread of my existence, not only that part of it which I have already passed through, but “ that which runs forward into all the depths of eternity. When “ I lay me down to sleep, I recommend myself to his care; when I “ wake, I give myself up to his directions. Amidst all the evils “ that threaten me, I will look up to him for help, and question “ not, but he will either avert them or turn them to my advantage.

“ Though I know neither the time nor the manner of death I am to “ die, I am not at all solicitous about it; because I am sure, that “ he knows them both, and that he will not fail to comfort and “ support me under them.”

Nothing need be added to this beautiful declaration of hope and trust in God, except that I pray, that it may always be made by me and mine, under a firm conviction, that it is only in Jesus Christ our Saviour as God manifest in the flesh, that we can have any just view of God's mercy, and any assurance of favour and acceptance with Him. I would not wish to repeat it as a moral heathen or deist might do, but as a Christian worshipper.

In the evening, a bright meteor appeared in the north, passing from west to east, and it lightened a great deal during the night.

3d and 4th. We were favoured with good wind, and made tolerable progress. Two brigs hove in sight, and great numbers of flying fish skimmed along the surface of the water, or flew from the top of one wave to the other, pursued by bonettas or dolphins. When the weather was fine, the captain always contrived to keep his men employed; they were now engaged in making a new mainsail, and the black carpenter in building a new cabouse or kitchen, for his black brother, the cook. In the evening, some flying fish fell on board. Their bodies are shaped somewhat like a small herring, with large eyes. Their wings, or flying fins, reach nearly to the tail, and spread three inches; but when dry, they can no longer support the fish above water.

5th. At daybreak, land was seen. It was Sal, one of the Cape de Verd islands, and presented itself through a hazy atmosphere, with two high peaks and some lower mountains to the north of them, a low land running out to the south. The breeze had freshened during the night, and the sea was rather turbulent, the spray often flying over the ship. After our morning service, the captain informed us, that the island of Bonavista, thirty miles from the former, was in sight. This island is the most picturesque of any we had hitherto seen. Coming from the north, its first appearance was that of two steep hills inclosing a lower range; but as we sailed along its eastern coast, several ranges of mountains, of beautiful shapes and different heights, one after the other, opened to view. Some were cones, with craters on their rocky summits. The country below them, though here and there showing patches of a green colour, had, in general, a very barren appearance. The haziness of the weather would not permit us distinctly to discover any smaller objects. The waves also sometimes swelled to such a height, as to hide the island for a moment from our view; but as we passed swiftly along, we were much amused by the continual shifting of the scene, exhibiting the mountains in ever-varying positions. We were however disappointed in our hopes of seeing Mayo, another of these islands, a thick mist overspreading the horizon about sunset. The strong favourable wind continued all night.

6th. This morning we had a very pleasing exhibition of the wonderful agility and swiftness of a host of bottle-nosed porpoises, coming from the north. For nearly half an hour they played and frisked about the ship's bows, leaping out of the water, pursuing each other in all directions, tumbling tail over head, and performing all kinds of tricks. They seemed perfectly happy, and bade defiance to all attempts to pierce them. They were, by guess, from three to four feet long. It lightened again in the evening, and during the night, but the wind continued to favour us.

8th. We were proceeding with a steady breeze in fine weather, when about noon the sky became overcast, and very black clouds began to rise from the south-east. The captain coming on deck, rather alarmed us, by the haste in which he gave orders to shorten sail. The swiftness also with which the clouds came rolling on, was remarkable, and they brought with them such a sudden gust of wind, that the utmost exertion hardly saved the royals and studding-sails from being blown away, before they could be taken in. Some mischief was done to the rigging, and we could hardly stand on deck. For about an hour, we ran furiously through the water, when another cloud, much more black and threatening than the former, appeared in the south. Its approach was announced by several claps of thunder of increasing loudness, and we prepared for a heavier squall, when, after a quarter of an hour's violent rain, it suddenly fell calm. Then, however, our troubles began, for the sea having become extremely agitated by the fury of the former gale, the swell was tremendous; and as there was no wind to carry us forward, the ship, being at its mercy, plunged very hard. A wave struck her a-stern, broke two of the cabin windows, overstreamed all the books, papers, and whatever lay on the lockers, and filled the floor some inches high with water. Fortunately not much injury was done, but we were obliged to put in dead-lights, and glad to retreat on deck out of so hot and dark a dungeon. Our patience was now again put to trial by the return of calms and light baffling winds, by the sailors called cat's-paws. In the evening, a hawk, after flying long about the ship, perched on the fore-yard near the fore-top, and was taken. She was a beautiful bird. I protested against her destruction, as being contrary to all rules of hospitality, but could not save her.

9th. About three in the morning, a black cloud with very vivid lightning and loud thunder approached us, but brought little either of wind or rain. More short squalls assailed us during the day. A brig having appeared in sight to the north-east, and proving to be a Portuguese, bound to the Brazils, we sent a packet of letters on board, which her captain promised to deliver safely.

In the evening, clouds came on with thunder and lightning, and while we were singing our evening-hymn, several strong flashes illuminated our little cell. But while the elements seemed at war without, the peace of God comforted our hearts within.

10th. The Portuguese brig, which had approached us during the squall, tacked and stood to the westward. This satisfied us that she was not bound to the coast of Guinea for slaves, as those who had yesterday been on board suspected. There is no doubt, however, that the slave-trade is secretly carried on under various pretences, notwithstanding the severity of the laws, and the vigilance of government.

I read to-day part of a "Collection of Anecdotes," in a German work, professedly written to promote morality. What pains are taken to adorn the dead body, and make it look alive! to tie good fruit upon rotten branches; and, like the prophets of Baal in the days of Elijah, to expect fire from heaven sent by a god of man's own making. The effects of the writings of sentimental foreigners and their new-fangled systems of philosophy, having so clearly proved of what value they are in reforming the minds and manners of mankind, by the late commotions in the world, ought long ago to have excited more attention to the truths of revelation, which declare man to be by nature, "dead in trespasses and sins," and unable to do good without a change of heart, wrought by faith in Jesus Christ our Saviour. But both in this, and in some other modern publications, there is yet a studied attempt to prove, that it does not signify, whether a man be a Christian, a Jew, a Turk, a Heathen, or a Deist, if he but now and then do a good action, and show himself less a slave of passion than others. Then, say they, you are acceptable to God, and this is called enlightening! May God in mercy preserve us from such delusion!

11th. Poison having been spread about the lower part of the ship to kill the rats, an intolerable smell kept me awake great part of the night. The perishing carcasses of these creatures are surely a greater nuisance, than their existence. I repented, that I had complained some days ago that one of them had run over my face in the night.

13th. We encountered a heavy squall with thunder and rain, by which we gained some gallons of sweet water. This was the more acceptable, as for some time past, the water in our casks sent forth a very offensive smell, being hardly fit to drink, except when filtered through a dripping-stone, made of Maltese fossil-limestone.

16th. Flying fish and many kinds of sea-fowl appeared in great numbers, and on the 17th, the captain, after many vain attempts both by himself and the crew, had the good fortune to catch a fish. It was an albicore, and had a flying fish in its stomach. Its length was about two feet, its colour dark green with darker stripes and spots on the back, its belly of the most brilliant mother of pearl, its mouth small, the body narrow across the back, and about six inches deep between back and belly, sloping off to an inch and a half at the root of the tail. The latter is vertical and forked. It had six fins, two on the breast, one on each side, and two dorsal fins, from which, to the root of the tail, six small triangular fins were placed in a row. It was caught with a hook baited with feathers, which the foolish gormandizing creature mistook and seized for a flying fish. This evening a new mainsail was bent.

18th. We crossed the line, when the usual ceremonies took place: Neptune and his wife appeared in the persons of the black carpenter and the second mate, most ridiculously apparelled and painted, a large grain representing the trident. His aquatic majesty declared his great satisfaction, on being informed, that the vessel that had the boldness to enter his dominions, belonged to his old friends, the English, and kindly offered his services to initiate us into his society, by shaving and sousing. The ceremony was however dispensed with, in consideration of sixteen bottles of hollands, to be distributed among the crew at a bottle a-day, lest they should be more hurt than benefited by the gift. The cabin-boy submitted to the operation. Being seated on a bar laid across a large tub, and lathered with a composition of tar and grease, he was duly shaved with a piece of an iron hoop, and well soused, by three buckets of water poured over his head. While I was pitying him on account of such rough usage, he came to me into the cabin, and expressed, with great glee, the satisfaction he now felt, in being made a thorough seaman, free of all headlands, promontories, &c. whereas, before this initiation, freshmen must pay fines, and submit to many other degradations. Considering the liberty always given on this occasion, the crew behaved very orderly.

We dined to-day on the albicore, caught yesterday, and found it excellent food. The flesh was white and brown; both parts equally good.

19th. In the evening, before the moon rose, the sea abounded with large bright spots of apparently phosphoric light, or detached collections of those sparks, which, singly, accompanied us every where.

20th. Several men of war birds flew about the ship. Their bodies are not large, but their wings extend a great way. Oldendorp, in his Account of the West Indies, speaks of fourteen feet from tip to tip. Their bill is pointed, and they pounce upon flying and other small fishes with great dexterity and swiftness.

21st. For some days I have been feasting my mind on Milton's Paradise Lost. To make any remarks on a poem so sublime and unrivalled, may seem strangely impertinent; but, may I be permitted to say, that, whether from my increased aversion to heathen mythology, or an idea, that its subjects are here and there brought in, chiefly as a display of classical knowledge, when quite unnecessary, I felt as if this truly christian and evangelical poem was rather bespattered than ornamented by these old fooleries. Now and then, I grant, they are well introduced, when their absurdity is shown; but am I right in thinking, that the whole might have been as excellent, as classical, and as sublime, without much allusion to such wretched nonsense? I fear, however, that to those, who consider the study of the ancient authors and poets of Greece and Rome an essential preparation for a work of this kind, it might have been a sufficient cause to reject the whole poem, had it not abounded with such classical allusions. More is the pity, that the infinitely more sublime and elevated language of truth in the Bible should be so seldom imitated, and be made to give way to the lying and silly devices of idolatrous heathen. Nay, I fear that Milton's Paradise Lost will by some be laid upon the shelf, as an old obsolete performance, merely because it sets forth the truth, in showing the fall and depravity of man, and salvation by faith in a crucified Saviour. The adulterous fondness for the works of modern poetasters, celebrating the exploits of murderers and prostitutes, which has siezed the present generation, is a proof, that sound taste is fast declining, together with sound religion. I was anew charmed with the beautiful simplicity and grandeur of Milton's ideas, especially in the first six books throughout. It is to be lamented, that he was such an incorrigible republican; but he lived in bad times.

22d. We were now favoured with the regular south-east trade-wind, and proceeded for many days, steadily keeping on our course, with fine weather, seldom disturbed by clouds and showers; though sometimes annoyed by the uneasy motion of our small brig. Going one morning on deck, a sudden heel threw me against the companion, by which I hurt my back, and experienced much inconvenience for some time. Yet I had gained such a relish for continual employment in reading and writing, that I did not suffer myself to be disturbed by a little pain. I also very much enjoyed the conversation of my fellow-travellers, in which we generally spent a few hours after sun-set, sitting on deck, beholding the ever-varying play of the numberless waves of the ocean, and deriving amusement and instruction from a variety of objects; for truly, "They that go down to the sea in ships, they see the wonders of the Lord in the deep;" nor is a voyage so dull a business as some would think. The waves, the clouds, the stars, shining with double lustre through a clear atmosphere, the effect of the sun and moon on the restless surface of the water, frequent and beautiful nocturnal exhibitions of lightning on the horizon, the appearance of fishes and birds at an immense distance from any known land, the progress of the vessel, the unexpected, and therefore highly welcome sight of ships of different nations, and occasional conversation with them in passing, and, I may add, the constant changes of hopes, fears, and reliefs from false alarms, with other subjects affecting the feelings; besides the various occupations of the crew, the interest taken in the fate of the animals on board,—all these things not only keep alive the mind of any person, not wholly apathetic and inattentive to what passes around him, but tend to prevent languor and impatience from gaining too much ground. And what abundant resources are there not found in study, and the contemplation of the works of nature and art; for the pursuit of which, a long voyage affords much leisure and convenience, seldom interrupted. •

Want of appetite, and frequent sleepless nights, which I considered as a very acceptable commutation for sea-sickness, having never suffered from the latter after the first week, had robbed me of much strength, but not of health, or energy of mind. I was therefore satisfied, not to be able, without great weariness, to walk about the decks, and comforted myself with the hopes of the return of my usual powers, when wanted; nor was I disappointed. A week passed without any occurrence worthy of notice.

28th. Having spent some days without seeing a cloud, a fish, a bird, or any thing to excite either alarm or wonder, we were again visited by showers and strong puffs of wind. A flying fish fell on board, of a larger size than any we had yet seen, with black flying fins, its body about fourteen inches long. However, the unphilosophical tars had mutilated him, before he was brought into the cabin for inspection.

I read to-day the preface of the German bible, printed at Basle in 1741. It gives an account of the manner in which the reading of the Scriptures was opposed in the Roman Catholic church, when even the clergy were kept in ignorance of its contents. How great was that darkness, when the whole Christian world tamely submitted to such spiritual tyranny, and kings and princes were the dupes of wicked, designing, and ignorant priests! How little are those blessings, which we enjoy in our day, considered and valued by some, who in their indifference to them, and under a supposition, that the spirit of popery is changed, see no danger in taking off a salutary restraint, by which our pious ancestors sought to guard and maintain that liberty of conscience, for which they were ready to shed their blood. Surely, restraint by wholesome laws cannot be called slavery, by men, who know how to distinguish between liberty and licentiousness.

29th. At home or abroad, by sea or land, wherever I am, I can never forget the mournful event of this day, when our family and church were bereft of that excellent man, my father, in the year 1786. Though now nearly thirty years are gone by, yet, when the return of this day brings his death to my recollection, I feel some recurrence of the pangs, which then seized my heart. But I remember, that once in his last illness, calling me to his bed-side, he expressed himself to the following effect, in consequence of the lamentations of a friend, who had just left the room: “ There is nothing, my dear son, that grieves me more, than to “ hear such complaints; not because, far from flattering me, they “ only remind me the more forcibly of my defects, but because “ they evince a deplorable want of knowledge of, and confidence “ in, the dealings of God with His Church and servants. He wants “ none of us; but if He is pleased to use us, surely He knows “ best, when to put down one tool and take up another. And “ will He suffer any part of his work to stand still, for want of “ instruments to work with? No! He will find such as are suited “ to His hand, and to the times and circumstances, when they “ are to be employed.” This is indeed true, but I yet believe, that the concurrent testimony of all who knew my late father, will permit me to say, that, taking his character in a general sense, and viewing him as a man and as a christian, we shall not soon look on his like again.

To-day there was a considerable swell from the south-west, which is as regularly met with in these seas, as the north-west swell in the northern hemisphere. Some slight squalls passed by on each side of us, and a water-spout was seen in the west.

30th. We were agreeably roused from sleep before four in the morning by news, that a large ship was approaching. A general scramble ensued, to prepare parcels of letters to be sent to England. On hailing, she proved to be the Sydney Cove from Rio de la Plata, bound to Liverpool. Our captain immediately went on board and staid some time. Meanwhile the two vessels got pretty close together. On his return, he brought a present of half a sheep just killed, but could get no fruit. The Sydney Cove had encountered a very heavy gale from the eastward twenty days ago, while we were in smooth water. Her captain was glad to rectify his reckoning by the calculations made by our chronometer, from which his log differed widely. The morning was beautiful, and the sun rose majestically from the bosom of the ocean.

I read to-day a pamphlet entitled "The Spirit of British Missions." It is a compilation of various accounts of all the existing missionary societies, with addresses and exhortations, showing great earnestness and zeal in the cause. With much candour and liberality the author brings into notice the labours of every missionary society now existing in Britain.

December 1st. We have now been two months at sea, and some of us began to look with eagerness to the conclusion of our voyage. But we have no cause for complaint. Rather ought we to be very thankful to Him, whom wind and waves obey, that our voyage has been attended with no disaster whatever; and though sometimes annoyed by calms, we have seldom met with contrary winds, or any thing like a storm. Ever since we entered the south-east trades, the sails have nearly stood in the same position; and by many favourable shifts of wind, we have been able to get better to the eastward than is usually done in these latitudes.

3d. Being Advent Sunday, we used the Liturgy appointed for the day, and the discourse delivered by brother Clemens was suitable and impressive. To-day, a species of that curious animal, called by some the Portuguese man of war, was thrown by a wave into the mizen chains, and brought on deck for our inspection. It seemed to be a young one, its body only three inches long, and shaped like that of a snail, quite transparent, of a light cerulean blue, passing into green towards the head, which had a kind of crest like a fan, also transparent and tinged with purple at the top. A number of antennæ of a deep blue colour proceeded from the body, and a tail, from three to four feet long, looking like a string of small blue beads. On examining it more narrowly, Mr Buck happening to prick its body with the sharp point of a penknife, it instantly shrunk together, and almost vanished, nothing but a small pulpy substance remaining. In the evening, there was much distant lightning towards the west,

4th. Having, during a sleepless night, been led into much reflection on different subjects, with which, during the last thirty years of my life, I have more or less been occupied, I determined to avail myself of my present leisure, to make some memorandums in "Letters to my children," whose affectionate and dutiful behaviour has ever been a subject of my thanksgiving to God. The execution of this project occupied me for some time, and proved a new and powerful remedy against languid feeling and impatience. These memorials relate to the origin,—1st. Of my acquaintance with some of the most worthy men of the present age. 2d. Of the abolition of the slave-trade. 3d. Of the peculiar interest I feel in missionary exertions. 4th. The views I have of the religious influence of music. 5th. An account of several events, which call for gratitude to God for preservation, and for other mercies, shown to myself and family, &c. Of these letters I finished five, before we reached the Cape.

5th. The black cook having been more conceited than successful in baking wheaten bread, Brother Thomsen offered his services, with Mr. Buck, for his assistant. They commenced their operations this morning, and after some experiments, produced very good rolls for breakfast. The cook's darkened visage displayed indeed some uneasiness at being thus superseded, and his oven used by amateurs in the profession; but we all experienced the benefit of it, relishing what we knew had been prepared with clean hands. My appetite also was thereby much improved, and I believe, that the loss of it, and consequent decrease of strength, would at length have proved hurtful to my general health, and perhaps lowered my spirits, which were never more lively and active, had not this change of food afforded a seasonable relief. On this and the following days, we had strong, favourable wind, and the ship went steadily through the water. We were now visited by various kinds of water-fowl, Cape pigeons, mother Carey's chickens, and several birds with long beaks, unknown to us. Porpoises also played about us; but, in general, we have lately appeared as if we were quite alone swimming in this vast ocean, not a creature approaching us. Our ship being new-coppered, the captain supposed, that the brightness of its bottom might alarm the finny inhabitants of the deep.

10th. The wind increased in strength, but remained in our favour. For the first time we had long-continued rain, which kept us all shut up in the cabin. We spent the time in reading letters from Greenland, received shortly before my departure from England. I sent my answers from Capetown, and they arrived safe, by way of Copenhagen, in Greenland, in the spring of 1816. None, indeed, of the many letters I wrote on board, and sent by various ships, and from the Cape, were lost, but all arrived sooner or later at the places of their destination, in Greenland, Labrador, North America, the West Indies, Surinam, Sarepta near Astrachan, Germany, Denmark, and England; which shows a facility of communication over all the world, unknown to former generations, as the fruit of a widely extended and well arranged commercial intercourse among civilized nations.

12th. To-day I read the first book of Esdras in the Apocrypha. I was much struck with many passages in it, relating to the coming of the Messiah, and the New Testament dispensation, and particularly with the 5th chapter, verse 40th. The weather was showery; some sea-weed floated by, and the people thought, that they had heard the report of a gun to the southward. But we remained alone, driven by a brisk southerly wind, rather too much to the east, a current from the south setting against us. We were to-day in latitude $34^{\circ} 23'$ and the air in this southern hemisphere is much colder, than in the same degree and season in the northern: we were even glad to be on deck, to warm ourselves by the sun.

14th. A small species of cat-fish was thrown on board by a wave. Its appearance is singular. Its head in a bag, with two large eyes, but without any thing deserving the name of a body. Eight long tails or antennæ proceed from the back of the head, two longer than the rest, and furnished with claws. All of them are ornamented with pearls or beads on the edges. The whole fish was about six inches long. The cold was to-day very troublesome, and on account of the strong current from the south, and the state of the wind, we tacked, and stood towards the south, fearing to make the land too far to the northward.

15th. The captain, Mr. Buck, and two of the missionaries, went out in the jolly boat, when Mr. Buck shot two albatrosses. 'This is a magnificent bird. The wings extend to above eight feet, when spread. Its beak is about five inches long, hooked, and tipped with red, an orange-coloured line running along the upper edge. Its forehead broad, and, like the breast and belly, of the purest white, covered with the most beautiful, soft, downy plumage. Its webbed feet are white, and its wings black and grey, and furnished with three joints. The first turns the wing, when at rest, towards the tail, the second back to the breast, and the third again towards the tail. The tail is short in proportion to the size of the bird. Those shot were both ducks, and we supposed a much larger bird of the same kind, with a white back, which flew about the ship, but could not be shot, to be the drake. A smaller bird, called by some the Cape pigeon, came on board, and was killed. This pretty creature had a pointed bill, black, and about an inch and a half long; its crown black; its back, and the top of its wings, of a blueish grey; its feet webbed, but furnished with long sharp claws, like a land-bird; its belly and throat snow-white. The whole bird about a foot long from the head to the tip of the tail, which is forked and fan-shaped.

About noon, and for several hours, the heavens being remarkably clear and cloudless; but the air filled with a reddish haze, the sun was surrounded by a very large perihelion, in appearance about ten diameters from its orb: towards the east, its brightness was so great, that it faintly showed prismatic colours. The captain observed, that he had never seen a similar phenomenon: but I remember, when I was in Germany, during a remarkably cold winter, that, on a bright day, Fahrenheit's thermometer being at 28° below 0. a similar exhibition was seen. A bright circle surrounded the sun, other circles passing through its centre, and intersecting the former. Where the intersections took place, very bright spots appeared, called mock-suns. This evening, the clouds in the west were beautifully tinged with brown, but seemed at variance both with each other, and with the wind: the sky had appeared thus for some days, the clouds taking a course in our favour, while the wind remained contrary. We hoped, therefore, for a favourable change; nor were we disappointed.

16th. The air and water seemed filled with all kinds of birds, flying or swimming. The albatrosses were the most interesting. They seem to rise heavily from the water, and for some time keep flying not far from its surface. By degrees they mount up, and soar to a great height, where they hover like a kite, wheeling about, and approaching without much fear towards the ship, little aware of the preparations making for their destruction; or rather bidding defiance to our marksmen, who with all their exertions could never hit, nor even frighten, any one of them. I protested against firing at inoffensive creatures, without any prospect of profiting by their death; for as the boat had been painted, and could not be used to fetch them out of the water, if shot, the cruelty of wounding or killing them, merely to show skill in shooting, was manifest. I grant, that for the purpose of obtaining food, or even for examination of any unknown animal, one may kill without offence; but if that cannot be done, we have no right to take away life. My exhortations were at first disregarded, and my arguments pronounced overstrained; but by degrees, aided by the total failure of the sport, they availed, to the preservation of many of our winged visitors, who indeed deserved to be spared, if only for the entertainment they afforded us. Cape pigeons now and then alighted upon the sternsail booms, or on the bowsprit, for rest; but if one had gained a seat, it would not suffer another to sit down beside it, but in that case chattered and quarrelled, and at length fought, till either himself or his neighbour was forced off. Their look and habits seem like those of a land-bird, but we saw one arrive with a small fish in its bill. Their figure is remarkably neat: when they fly, they contract or spread their fan-shaped tails, and when sitting, cross the ends of their long wings over their tails, so as to give them the appearance of being doubly forked. Bottle-nosed porpoises, also, of various sizes, played often about the ship; and a shark was seen scudding along, on some murderous errand.

20th. Towards evening the sky looked threatening in the west; and after sunset, it began to blow hard, and the sea was magnificently restless. The waves frequently beat over our bows, and we had little rest during the night, on account of the ship's motion and the roaring of the sea, which we had never heard before to that degree. About midnight, a tremendous sea broke over our stern, with a rattling noise; but after so long a voyage, we were no more so much affected by these alarms; and knowing that the wind was in our favour, felt rather thankful for the speed, with which we ran through the water, at the rate of eight knots and a half an hour.

21st. Being St. Thomas's day, we sung the usual Liturgy appointed for that day in our Church, and were led into much useful meditation on that most remarkable account given by the Evangelist of our Saviour's appearing to His unbelieving disciple, when, by beholding the marks of the wounds in His hands, feet, and side, proving Him to be verily the same Jesus, who was crucified, dead and buried, but now risen again, a conviction was wrought in his heart, that He was his Lord and God. From this event, those who go forth to preach the Gospel, may learn a most important lesson.

22d. The wind had turned against us in the night, and cast a damp upon the sanguine hopes of some of our party, that we should soon see the Table-Mountain. The sea appeared wild, and during the afternoon, had changed its colour. A sailor was sent to the mast-head to look for land, but the foggy appearance of the horizon prevented his seeing it. By the captain's reckoning, we were only forty-five miles off. At ten at night, the water had a singular appearance. It looked muddy and white, and was plentifully bestrewed with sparks. The waves, whose foaming had appeared extremely bright, had subsided, and the captain felt some alarm. We hove to; but, on sounding, no bottom was found with a line of one hundred and fifty fathoms. We therefore kept under an easy sail all night.

23d. The wind turned against us, and the sea became restless. All at once, the second mate, who had taken his station in the main-top, roused us from our dullness, by calling out "Land!" He discovered it among light clouds to the south-east. It was the Table-Mountain, and some of the adjoining hills. The captain being called up, expressed his disappointment, on finding it lying in that direction. As the wind changed a point or two in our favour, we got on slowly towards it, and hoped soon to reach Table-Bay, when suddenly it fell calm, and the rolling of the ship became troublesome. Meanwhile, as the weather cleared up, leaving only some white clouds on the Table-Mountain and the Devil's-Hill, we were exceedingly delighted with the view before us. Besides the magnificent group of rocky mountains to which the Table-Mountain belongs, there appeared, farther inland, a very picturesque range, of singular shapes, some with rocky peaks, others flattened like Table-Mountain. We spent the afternoon at the mercy of the waves, anxiously waiting for a wind.

24th. There was something rather distressing in our present situation. We were at the entrance of the bay, but in danger of being again driven out to sea; which is not uncommon off the Cape. The captain, to our sorrow, had hurt his head so much, that for some hours he was quite disabled. Meanwhile, advantage having been taken of every short puff of wind to get in closer, we found ourselves in the morning of the 24th near Robben Island, in the neighbourhood of which rocks are numerous and dangerous. A current setting towards them, the want of wind made our entrance from the north-west rather hazardous, and we waited anxiously for the sea breeze. The sky was perfectly clear, and the sun rose with great majesty, behind the Stellenbosch mountains. About eight, a gentle breeze sprung up, and we sailed forward. A grampus followed us, and numerous large gulls, with white bodies, and black wings, tipped with white edgings, hovered about the ship, as we entered the bay.

Table-Bay is surrounded by very picturesque scenery, upon which the eye may feast for a long time without weariness. We therefore did not regret the slowness, with which we approached the anchoring-place, off the town. Capetown presents itself pleasantly situated at the foot of the Table-Mountain. The whiteness of its buildings give it a cheerful appearance; but the low tower of the Calvinist church, surmounted by a squat pyramidal steeple, is its only prominent feature. As we moved slowly forward, we were boarded by the harbour-master, who came to demand the mail-bags. The doctor accompanied him, to examine into the state of health of the crew and passengers. Before this has been done, no one is suffered to land. A pilot having brought the ship to an anchor, I went on shore, to inquire about lodgings, and having met with a most cordial reception from our worthy friend Mrs. Disandt and her family, returned on board with her son Mr. Daniel Disandt, to bring the company on shore.

We landed at the pier, and soon found ourselves comfortably lodged at Mrs. Disandt's house, in the Graave Straat, not far from the church, thankful to God, that we had now reached the place of our destination, after so safe and prosperous a voyage.

CHAPTER II.

Transactions on our arrival at Capetown. Journey to Gruenekloof. Bullock Waggon described. First meeting with the Christian Hottentots. Conclusion of the year 1815.

DECEMBER 24th. We had not been long on shore, before Mr. Henry Hancke, a friend of Mrs. Disandt's family, came to bid us welcome, and kindly offered to render us every assistance. From this gentleman I have received so many favours during the whole time of my abode at the Cape, that I should not discharge the debt of gratitude I owe to him, did I not, immediately on introducing his name into my narrative, express my great obligations to him, as they regard both the mission and my own person. He had promised our late worthy friend, Mr. Disandt, shortly before his death, that he would not only befriend his family, and assist them with his advice, but endeavour to promote the interests of the Brethren's Mission among the heathen in this colony, to which Mr. Disandt had always approved himself a kind friend and benefactor. Mr. Hancke has in every respect fulfilled the wishes of his dying friend with exemplary faithfulness, and both the family and the mission have derived the most essential benefit from his active services. To find such a friend on our arrival, added to the kind and hospitable reception we met with from Mrs. Disandt and her children, made us soon forget the tediousness of a long voyage, and feel ourselves quite at home in her house.

The first conversation I had with Mr. Hancke upon the general concerns of our mission at Gruenekloof, considerably relieved my mind, and I perceived, that, by the gracious providence of God, things were in such a state of preparation, that my transactions with his Excellency, the Governor, and with the colonial Secretaries, would be rendered much more easy, than I expected. As they have no relation to the journey and the general state of the Mission, they will, of course, form no part of this narrative.

After dinner, Mr. Hancke proposed a walk, to see the town. Passing through several streets, we entered the Governor's, late the Company's, gardens, which afford to the inhabitants a pleasant promenade. The avenues are planted with oak of luxuriant foliage, skirted on each side by hedges of myrtle. The ground is laid out in squares, enclosed between high hedges. Within a stone fence, several ostriches and other birds, and in a separate building, a lion, lioness, a tyger, and two or three more wild animals were kept. Leaving the gardens, we walked to the foot of Table-Mountain. Already before we landed, we had observed a white mist creeping up from the south, through the opening between the Devil's-Hill and the flat summit of Table-Mountain. This had now nearly covered the former, and was fast spreading along the rocky sides and summit of the latter, carrying with it a blast of wind, which in a short time grew so strong, that we could hardly stem its force. The change from the most clear, calm, and warm weather, to storm and fog, was almost instantaneous; and before we could reach any kind of shelter, we were driven along by the gale, shivering with cold, and glad to make the best of our way towards home. The storm proved also a great annoyance to several groups of males and females, chiefly slaves, and other people of colour, met on the common, carousing, playing, or dancing, as is usual here on Sundays and holidays. The variety of faces, complexions, and dresses, seen among the common people, is very striking. The greater part are black or tawny. Not many genuine Hottentots, but various mixtures between Hottentots and slaves or other natives of the Mozambique shore, Malays, and negroes, have here their residence, and are known by the general name of bastards. Many are Mahomedans; but there appears little religious animosity among them, every one doing what seemeth good in his own eyes. As to the Christian inhabitants, the English, Dutch Calvinists, and German Lutherans, possess the churches; the two former joining in the use of the great church. The latter have lately obtained permission to build one for themselves.

The streets are laid out in right angles; the houses stuccoed, whitened, and chiefly consisting of two stories, though a few of them exceed that height. Their general appearance is neat and clean. As in the towns in Holland, and some parts of Germany, large carved door-cases, grotesque decorations of gable-ends, and huge gates, leading to small houses, are met with here and there; but, in general, it may well pass for an English town.

I gave notice of our arrival to the Missionaries at Groenekloof, by the usual Sunday's post, forwarded by a dragoon. We were sorry to miss the celebration of Christmas-Eve, in one of our settlements.

25th. Christmas-day. We attended divine service in the Lutheran church, of which the Rev. Mr. Hesse is minister. German hymns are sung, but the sermon is delivered in Low Dutch, a language, as yet, unintelligible to us.

The church is a handsome building, with three aisles; the roofs supported by columns of the Ionic order; the galleries judiciously placed behind them. The organ is new, and of considerable magnitude. The church has no steeple, but a short pyramid is placed on the pediment over the entrance.

When the service was over, Mr. Hancke accompanied me to the house of Mr. Alexander, the colonial Secretary. Here I delivered my letters of introduction, and afterwards called on the President of the court of justice, Mr. Trutter, and on the Fiscal, Mr. De Nyssen. Some missionaries from other societies paid us agreeable visits. With one of them I took a walk towards evening, and noticed several objects, new to me. The mountains were enveloped in clouds, but the sky otherwise clear. We passed by some vineyards. The vines grow without espaliers, placed in rows, like currant-bushes in our gardens. When arrived at a certain height, the upper shoots are taken off, to increase the quantity of grapes. Fences of the large aloe, and of cactus or Indian fig, are common. Of pisang, we saw several large beds.

26th. In the forenoon, we had the great pleasure to see our missionary, Brother Schmitt and his wife arrive from Groenekloof, in a waggon, drawn by twelve bullocks. The unexpected information received of our arrival at the Cape, had made them take immediate steps to meet us. They had also provided waggons for our conveyance to Groenekloof, where the Brethren Marsveld and Bonatz from Gnadenthal were soon expected. Meanwhile, having occasion to call at a watchmaker's shop, we found him to be a lively old German, who entertained us with a narrative of his adventures. He gave us also an account of the dreadful plague of the small-pox, by which this colony was visited about four years ago, and a great number of people of all ages and sexes were carried off. He was one of those, who suffered most severely. Flags were hung out from the windows of those houses where the disorder raged, to mark them as pestiferous; and thus for three months, he lived quite alone, in a dreadful state of mind and body, not expecting to survive. His friends placed victuals at the threshold of his door, but not even one of the family dared to approach or visit him in his affliction. "But," added he, "it was this affliction, that first taught me to know and fear God, and to consider the state of my immortal soul."

27th. I waited on Mr. Stoll, the landdrost of the Cape district, in which Groenekloof lies, and was by him introduced to Colonel Bird, deputy colonial Secretary, through whom permission must be obtained to remain in the colony, and to proceed into the country. He received me and the missionaries with great politeness. Having advised me to present my letters of recommendation to the Governor with my own hands, Mr. Hancke was so obliging as to carry me to Newlands in his sociable. The road lies along the eastern side of Table-Mountain, which here presents itself in shapes more picturesque and wild, than on the western, towards the town. The foot, both of the Devil's-Hill and Table-Mountain, is well clothed with witteboom, (protea argentea), oak, and other trees, the verdure and foliage of which were in great perfection. To the left is the bay, and the low hills on its northern shore; but towards the north-east the magnificent range of mountains of Stellenbosch and Drakenstein form a noble horizon. Various singular plants adorn the hedges and banks on each side of the road, among which the huge bushes of Indian fig in full bloom; the Chinese rose, growing to the height of sixteen or twenty feet; the aloc and pisang were particularly conspicuous. Many elegant houses, belonging to the citizens, with rich plantations surrounding them, lie along the foot of the mountains, precipices and grotesque rocks overhanging them in sullen majesty. We reached Newlands in about an hour, and found the Governor, Lord Charles Henry Somerset, at home. I presented to his Excellency the letters I had brought with me, and had a long conversation with him on various subjects, in which he assured me of his favourable disposition towards our missionaries, and his approbation of their exertions for the improvement both of the temporal and spiritual state of the Hottentots and other heathen tribes in this colony, as likewise of his readiness to remove every obstacle, that might impede the prosecution of their labours.

28th. Having received an invitation from Mr. Schmidt, a gentleman possessing a farm in the kloof between the Lion's-Head and Table-Mountain, our whole party walked to his house to breakfast. It lies about three English miles from the town. Passing through the yard of Mr. Zorn, formerly landdrost of the Cape district, we observed a tame mongoose, or mausehund, from Java, a species of viverra, which ran about, and suffered itself to be handled. It was a beautiful creature, about a foot long, with a sharp snout, from which the body rises, richly clothed with fine long hair, to about four inches in height, sloping off again to the end of the tail. Its colour was dark olive. When frightened or injured, it uttered a quick, jabbering noise. In its wild state, this creature is a most destructive depredator among all kinds of poultry.

Mr. Schmidt's farm lies in a very romantic situation. It is built upon a mass of rock of coarse granite, containing large crystals of feldspath, apparently in a state of slow decomposition. To the left of the house is the bed of a torrent, passing through a deep ravine. After crossing it by a stone arch, the path leads to some huge blocks of granite, which form altogether a singular mass of rock, overspread by oaks and other trees and shrubs, affording shade to the cattle. The grounds are filled with all kinds of fruit-trees and useful plants, every one of which seems to grow luxuriantly. Peach and orange orchards, and beds of pisang and bamboos occupy the slope of the hill.— After some time spent with this hospitable family, we returned, calling again at Mr. Zorn's house by the way. It is a good Dutch building, delightfully situated among shady groves of various trees. The garden abounds with a vast variety of large flowering shrubs and plants. The portico or gallery, running along the whole front of the building, has an espalier roof entirely covered with vines, the grapes hanging down in great profusion and beauty. An aviary contains some curious birds, both from Africa and the East Indies. Mr. Zorn was not at home; but we were hospitably received by Mr. Cloete, his son-in-law. Walking down the hill, the town presents itself very pleasantly, its streets crossing each other at right angles, with Table-Bay and the hilly country in the back-ground; but the want of towers and other prominent features detracts from its beauty. On the road, we noticed some large spiders, red locusts, and grasshoppers, peculiar to the Cape. My time at home was taken up with visiting both the friends of the Mission and some gentlemen in the public offices. Mr. Hancke also made me acquainted with Mr. Melville, Surveyor to the Government, with whom my readers will become yet better acquainted in the course of this narrative.

29th. Finding that waiting for the landing of the whole of our baggage, would detain us too long at Capetown, the Christmas holidays having intervened and caused delay at the Custom-house, we determined to proceed to Groenekloof this afternoon.

Mrs. Disandt's children brought me a cameleon, or, as the Dutch call it, a trapsoetjes, signifying an animal, that walks cautiously.

It is in shape and size like a common lizard, but with a proportionably larger head, and longer tail, which it coils downwards. Its eyes are situated in prominent tubes, easily moved to and fro, up or down, towards any object before or behind, together or separately, in different directions. Its general colour is green and orange, but it changes with the place it occupies among trees, grass, or stones. It has two toes on each foot, with which it clasps the small branches of the shrub or tree on which it may sit, drawing itself slowly along, or climbing from one to another. The whole creature is covered with small protuberances, of various hues.

About four o'clock P. M. we left Capetown, accompanied by the best wishes of our worthy and generous friends. Our caravan consisted of four waggons. The first, drawn by twelve, and the second, by fourteen bullocks, were occupied by our own party. In the third, which was uncovered and drawn by sixteen, a young Englishman, travelling our way, was allowed to have a seat. That, and the fourth, with fourteen bullocks, were appropriated for baggage and stores, destined for Groenekloof and its neighbourhood.

The waggons in use at the Cape have a strong frame-work body, with wheels and axle-trees made of iron-wood, or other wood, equally hard and tough. A travelling-waggon is furnished with seats, suspended by leather straps, to give them play, which, in some respects, answers the purpose of springs, and with a tilt of matting, covered with sailcloth, supported by hoops of bamboo. Curtains, of sailcloth or leather, hang before and behind, to secure the company against wind and rain. The bullocks draw by a wooden yoke, consisting of a strong bar laid across their necks, to which are fixed, in right angles downwards, four short pieces, so as to admit the neck of each animal between two of them. These are kept in their places, by being tied together below the neck with a small thong. A strongly plaited leather thong runs from the ring at the end of the pole to the yoke of the first pair of oxen, being fastened, in passing, to the middle rings of each yoke. The bullocks, by pushing with their shoulders, seem to draw with ease. The Hottentot driver has a whip, the stick of which is a strong bamboo, twelve and more feet long, and the lash, a plaited thong of equal or greater length. With this, to European grasp; unwieldy instrument, he not only cracks very loud, but hits any one of his bullocks with the greatest surety. But the chief engine of his government is his tongue, and he continually calls to his cattle by their names, directing them to the right or left by the addition of the exclamations of hott and haar, occasionally enforcing obedience to his commands by a lash, or by whisking or cracking his whip over their heads. A boy leads the foremost oxen by a thong fastened about their horns, and they seem to follow him willingly. We were accompanied a short way by our friends, Mr. Hancke and Mr. Daniel Disandt. The weather was clear, and the view of the mountains delightful.

The English have made good roads in the immediate neighbourhood of Capetown, and to Simon's Bay; but we soon left them, and dragged through deep sand, almost the whole way to Groenekloof. No trees, and but few shrubs, adorn the waste, but we noticed many pretty species of heath, and some elegant flowers, unknown to us. The most common plant is the so-called Hottentot fig. From beneath the sand is protruded, most of the way to the drift or fording-place of the Salt river, a porous iron-stone of singular character, appearing here and there perforated, like a honeycomb, or an umber of nuclei cleaving together, the cavities filled with ochre. This iron-stone is found almost in every part of the colony, both in the Cape district, and beyond the great ridges of mountains, in a variety of forms, in pebbles, large lumps, scattered about among the sand, or in veins. About sunset, we reached the large salt pans near the Riet Valley, so called from the quantity of reed-rushes growing in it. The people in the adjoining farm very civilly sent to invite us to the house; but we excused ourselves, wishing yet to proceed farther, before we took up our night's lodging in the wilderness. In about an hour's time, we unyoked the bullocks, and left them to seek their supper among the bushes. This is always done, if possible, at a place where there is a stream or pool of fresh water. The Hottentots having lighted a fire, a mat was spread on the ground to leeward of a large bush of the poison-apple, which screened us from a sharp south-east wind, black clouds on the horizon threatening us with a stormy, and perhaps rainy night. Coffee was boiled; of which, with some eggs, cold meat, cakes, and milk, we made an excellent supper, sitting round the fire. After our repast, we retired into the waggon to rest. The fire going out, and no preparation for our departure being made, Brother Schmitt, on inquiry, found, that eleven oxen were missing, for which the Hottentots had been searching in vain. To point out to the latter the place of our encampment, as well as to guard against the cold in this dark night, some of us rekindled the fire, keeping up a constant blaze, by feeding it with rhinoceros bushes, a resinous plant with large roots, but easily pulled up. After some hours, all hopes of finding the lost cattle having vanished, a different arrangement was made, and we proceeded with two waggon, leaving the other two to follow us.

30th. We passed by a farm on the Blaumberg, belonging to a Mr. Kotzee, and about sun-rise reached a place called Trefonteyn, an appendage to a farm, belonging to a Mr. Kous. Here we made another halt, and breakfasted under a thicket, consisting of different kinds of brush-wood and flowering shrubs. Into this cover, we saw a snake hastening with a young frog, entangled in its coils, but its swiftness was such, that all our exertions to destroy it only rescued the wretched captive. We now travelled through a barren, sandy heath, but the weather having cleared up, the sight of the hills about Groenekloof afforded us much pleasure, and Brother Schmitt pointed out the spot, where, some years ago, he narrowly escaped death, in a rencontre with a tyger. Being about an hour's drive from the settlement, we discerned at some distance a group of Hottentots, men, women and children, who had come out to meet us, with the missionary, Brother Fritsch, standing on a small rising ground near the road. As soon as the waggons had reached the spot, we alighted, and were welcomed by the Hottentots, who joined in singing that hymn, "Now let us praise the Lord," &c.

To describe our feelings on this occasion is not in the power of words. The various subjects for reflection, which rushed upon my mind at once, on seeing this company, lately a scattered race of wretched, ignorant, and wicked heathen, but now brought together as a people of God, among whom His word dwells daily and richly, made me inwardly exclaim: "Where is the wisdom of the wise! "where is the disputer of this world!" and the visionary theorist! Here is proof by facts, that "the Word of the Cross is the power "of God unto salvation to all them that believe." Here is seen the effect produced by the preaching of the gospel of a crucified Saviour, unadorned and unaided by human eloquence! I was greatly affected, beyond the power of utterance, and we all stood in silent devotion, listening to the sweet voices, which formed the delightful chorus. We shook hands with all of them, old and young, while, in the most affectionate and humble manner, they expressed their joy at our arrival. The whole procession now moved forward, some of the Hottentot women in an open bullock-waggon, which they had brought with them; the rest, with the men, partly on horseback and partly on foot. The settlement is seen like a fruitful field in the midst of a desert, and the road to the missionaries' houses lies through a small poplar wood. About five P. M. we arrived at the dwelling-house, and met with a most cordial welcome from another party of Hottentots, who had assembled at the door, and expressed their gratitude, that God had again sent teachers to them, by singing several verses, and by unaffected declarations of their joy.

After dinner, some of us walked out to see the settlement, entered some cottages, and found everywhere friendly faces and a kind reception. In the usual evening-meeting, Brother Fritsch addressed the congregation on the mercy of God, in granting, from time to time, a supply of ministers and teachers, who were willing to devote themselves to the work of God among the heathen, and especially among the Hottentots; and in prayer commended those who had just now arrived, to the guidance of His Holy Spirit, in all their future labours; praising Him for having brought them safely to this place. I then delivered a salutation from the Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel, and all our congregations in England, to the congregation of Christian Hottentots at Groenekloof. Brother Clemens did the same from the Elder's Conference of the Unity*, and the congregations in Germany. The Hottentots, of whom about a hundred and fifty were present, answered by loud thanksgivings. On quitting the chapel, several came to shake hands with us, saying, that they were not worthy, that we should come so far to serve them.

31st. After the forenoon's service, a Hottentot accosted me, desiring to speak with me alone. As I could not understand him, I requested Brother Schmitt to be present. The poor man came to make confession of his having been seduced by an old companion at Capetown, to drink more than he ought to have done; that he had thus overslept himself behind a bush, at the place where we spent the first part of the night, and suffered the cattle to go astray; and that he now came to ask forgiveness. Though his situation at that time was not observed by us, yet it had given offence to the Hottentots; and we represented to him, that he had not only hurt his own soul, but brought disgrace upon the cause of the gospel: that therefore it was necessary, for the present, to exclude him from the meetings of the baptized; to which sentence, Brother Schmitt added some serious and fatherly admonitions. His tears showed the grief he felt, and, as we hoped, his true repentance. This was the first instance I saw of that great change wrought in the heart of a heathen, who in his former state, thought drunkenness no sin, but now mourned over his being again overtaken, and seduced to the commission of the crime.

In the afternoon, all the missionaries met in conference, with a view to the conclusion of the year, and offered up prayer and praise to God our Saviour for all His mercies vouchsafed to them as a family, during the year past. In the evening, we walked into the settlement, and entered several houses and huts. In one we conversed with a venerable old man, upwards of eighty, who had descendants in the fifth generation. The conclusion of the year was made at twelve o'clock at night, in the manner usual in all our congregations, and we felt ourselves truly united in spirit with all, who here and in every place call upon the name of the Lord, and constitute altogether the family of God on earth, however distinguished by names, forms, and customs.

Account of Groenekloof. Burial-ground, and part of the Settlement, described. Conversation with the Hottentots. Arrival of missionaries from Gnadenthal. Father Marsveld. Conferences. Captain Klappmus. Order of Baptism. Journey to Capetown. Mr. Poleman's description of a Cave in Kango. Visit at Newlands. Mountains of Stellenbosch. Farms and Vineyards. Hottentot Holland's-Kloof. Journey to Gnadenthal. Arrival.

GROENEKLOOF is the name given to a district, situated about thirty miles to the north of Table-Bay, comprising several large farms. That, now occupied by the missionaries of the United Brethren, which is more particularly called Groenekloof, was formerly known by the name of De Kleene Post, (The Little Post).

The house and premises were originally in possession of the Dutch Company, but latterly let to a farmer. After the expiration of his lease, in 1808, the Earl of Caledon, then Governor of the Cape, having observed the benefits arising to the Hottentot nation from Christian instruction, prevailed upon the Brethren's missionaries at Gnadenthal, to form a settlement at this place, where many facilities existed for the maintenance of a congregation of Christian Hottentots. The Government at home having confirmed the grant, the Brethren were put in possession, and a number of Hottentots soon flocked to them from various places, both in and out of the colony.

The tract of land, given to the Mission, comprehends Groenekloof proper, with Lauwesklouf and Cruywagens-Kraal, two Hottentot stations. At the former, a Hottentot captain, with about a hundred persons of that nation, resided, previous to the establishment of the Mission. At the end of the year 1815, the number of inhabitants in the settlement at Groenekloof amounted to three hundred, old and young.

January 1, 1816. I took a walk to see the burial-ground, lying on the hill, north of the dwellings. It is a square piece of ground divided into four equal compartments by gravel-walks, and surrounded by a mound and ditch. On the mound is planted a fence of cactus or Indian fig, which, when grown up, will be a strong barrier against the intrusion of cattle. About thirty graves are at present in the ground, placed, according to the custom of our Church, in regular rows. The graves of the Hottentots are not marked by grave-stones, but by an upright piece of wood at the head of each, with a number painted on it, referring to the church-register, which shows the name and age of the person interred. From hence, the houses and huts of the Hottentots appear in the valley, the little wood separating them from the farm and missionaries' dwellings. The valley to the north and east is bounded by low bushy hills, on which lie several detached fragments of granite, of various shapes and sizes. A group of larger masses near the old stables forms a very picturesque assemblage of rock, interspersed with trees, and in many parts covered with aloes, many of them at present in full bloom. Except in very dry seasons, there is a little rivulet running at their foot towards the village. These stones and the cavities among them serve as a retreat for mausehunde or mongooses, muskiliat cats, and other destructive animals, as also for serpents, salamanders, lizards, mice, and moles. From the heights above the burial-ground, a pleasant view of Table-Mountain and its companions presents itself, and towards the east, part of the Stellenbosch range beyond the Dassenberg, and some lower hills are visible.

At ten o'clock, public service was held, as usual on New-year's day. I counted one hundred and seventy Hottentots present. Brother Schmitt delivered a powerful discourse on the name of JESUS. The attention of the auditory was such, that not one turned his eye off the preacher, but they all seemed as if they would eat his words. After the sermon, a child was baptized. I was much struck with the solemn manner, in which the parents are always previously asked, in presence of the whole congregation, whether it is their intention to educate the child, now to be baptized, in the fear and admonition of the Lord, and to devote it from its infancy to Him alone, as His redeemed property. Their answer in the affirmative is generally given with an expression of great sincerity and earnestness. During the whole day, parties of Hottentots came to wish their Teachers a happy New-year. Lehrer or Teachers is the name they generally give to the missionaries.

In the evening, some of us went into the settlement, and visited several families. The cottages are of different dimensions, materials, and workmanship. Some of the inhabitants are building houses with stone walls, which by degrees will become more general. In one house, where the people were very neatly dressed, were we treated with a pie, usually baked by them for the New-year. It tasted well, and they were much pleased to see us partake of their humble meal.

2d. The morning was spent in conversation concerning the affairs of the Mission. After dinner, I took a walk up the hill to the west of the farm. It is a steep bank, covered in most places with shrubs and brush-wood. A deep gully divides it from the hill, on which the burial-ground is situated, being the effect of torrents during the rainy season. The earth is everywhere coloured by iron, and of a deep brown or yellowish hue. The pebbles, with which the surface is plentifully strewed, are chiefly iron-stone, though mixed with some small fragments of quartz of so hard a texture, that it strikes fire, and was mistaken for flint. The waste produces some beautiful plants, among which I particularly noticed the Fahlblar, a species of aloe, the leaves of which are round, of a pale blue colour, and spreading near the ground, the stalk about a foot long, and the flowers, which are bell-shaped, and of a deep scarlet, hanging down in clusters. They adorn the bank behind Brother Schmitt's garden.

3d. Being a day appointed for the candidates for baptism, to converse with the missionaries and receive their advice, I attended, and was much pleased with the unreserved manner, in which they expressed their thoughts and the state of their minds. Whoever charges the Hottentots with being inferior to other people of the same class, as to education and the means of improvement, knows nothing about them. They are possessed of good sense and even of considerable gifts, in speaking on various subjects, within the reach of their apprehension. Some accompany their speech with gesticulations, which are natural and very unlike the grimaces of certain Europeans. The manner of the missionaries in conversing with, and instructing them, struck me as peculiarly calculated to call forth their confidence, as well as to impress their minds with great seriousness. When I ventured to address the Hottentots, I felt myself a great way behind these worthy men.

While we were thus engaged, a letter announced the approach of the missionaries Marsveld and Bonatz from Gnadenthal, whose waggons were seen moving slowly across the waste from the Dassenberg. Men and women went out to meet them. It was to me an affecting sight to see, with what joy the Hottentots bid them welcome as they alighted at the door. They flocked round Father

Marsveld to express to him that love, esteem and gratitude, which is so justly due to this venerable man, who, with his two younger associates, renewed the Cape mission in 1792, and now, at the age of seventy-one, is yet full of life and activity in prosecuting this work of God. I could hardly press forward to add my expression of joy, on beholding at length the face of one, whose character I have so long known and revered. All rejoiced to see Brother Bonatz, who had been long absent from Groenekloof, return in safety.

When the friendly bustle of bidding welcome was over, the people formed a semicircle in the yard, and sung a hymn of praise to God for having brought the travellers safe to their journey's end. All was yet new and highly interesting to me; I felt delighted to see and converse with the Hottentôts from Gnadenthal, and to be a witness of that truly christian union of heart, which produced the most sincere expression of friendship and brotherly love between them and those of Groenekloof. Even the sight of the Gnadenthal oxen added to my pleasure, as they were shortly to draw us to that place.

During the following days, we were engaged in conferences relating to the affairs of the Mission in this colony, and made several arrangements. Brother Stein was appointed to remain as an assistant at Groenekloof, and the rest of the party to go to Gnadenthal. In my walks, I made daily some new discovery, and every portion of time was employed in becoming better acquainted with those subjects, which were, at present, to be the business of my life. God mercifully granted to me a continuance of health and spirits, nor did the heat affect me.

4th. In the evening-meeting, I was surprised to hear, with what lively zeal and strength of voice, Father Marsveld addressed the congregation. He observed, that as the time of his departure out of this world was drawing near, he rejoiced once more to see this congregation of Christian Hottentots, and to join them in praising the Lord, for gathering a flock from among their nation, at this place, adding suitable exhortations and admonitions. The people could hardly restrain their desire of expressing their thanks, till he had finished his speech, when there was a general burst of thanksgiving from old and young.

6th. The festival of Epiphany was celebrated as usual, with much solemnity, being the commemoration of the first call of the heathen to their incarnate God and Saviour. The history of that event was read and explained to the congregation, from the second chapter of St. Matthew's gospel. After the public service in the afternoon, two catechumens were baptized. This was the first baptism of converts from among the heathen, at which I was present; and the whole transaction made an indelible impression on my mind. One of them, whom I baptized, was a daughter of the Hottentot captain Klapmus, of Lauweskloof. Her father had formerly been a noted enemy of the missionaries. His daughter, at the commencement of the Mission at Groenekloof, joined in opposition to the missionaries with much bitterness; but has since heard the gospel, and been convinced of the necessity of conversion. Though the old man persisted in his hostile disposition, he would not oppose his daughter's wishes to be instructed in the doctrines of Christianity, and even now declared his satisfaction at her being baptized. He was present, and afterwards visited the missionaries in their house; by whom he was kindly received, and admonished not to put off the day of his conversion. He even shed tears at parting, and we hoped, that, in his case also, by the Lord's unlimited mercy, "where sin abounded, grace may yet much more abound."

Having been requested to insert, in this narrative, some account of the internal course of the Missions of the Brethren among the heathen, as I wish to avoid prolixity, I will here, once for all, describe the order of baptism.

After the public service on Sunday morning, the infants of baptized parents are brought by them into the church; the mother being generally churched at the same time. First, a short hymn is sung, and a discourse delivered, addressed principally to the children, explanatory of the nature and intent of this ordinance, and the sacredness of the covenant therein made between the Lord and the person thus initiated into His Church on earth. After the discourse, the usual liturgy is read, and the parents being interrogated, respecting their intention to educate their child in the fear and admonition of the Lord, as above described (p. 44), baptism is administered, in the manner usual in our European congregations, one or two of the missionaries and their wives generally standing sponsors.

Adults are baptized in a public meeting on Sundays and festival-days, in the afternoon. The candidates appear decently dressed in white clothes. A hymn being sung, and a suitable discourse delivered, a vessel, covered with a white cloth, containing the water, with a small basin or laver in it, is placed before the candidate. The liturgy, prescribed to be used at the baptism of adults from among the heathen, is then read; and the questions, therein contained, being put to the candidates and answered, a prayer is offered up, after which the baptism takes place. The candidate kneeling and bending forward, the water is three times poured upon his head with the basin or laver, at the words, "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," when, if there are more to be baptized, the vessel being removed from one to the other by the chapel-servant, the missionary proceeds to the next, assisted by other ordained Brethren, if a larger number require it. The whole congregation then kneeling down, a doxology is sung, and the service concluded, by pronouncing the blessing: after which the newly-baptized come to the missionaries into the vestry, and are exhorted to faithfulness and constancy in the performance of their baptismal vow. They are likewise taught to know and pronounce the names given to them. Their gratitude and compunction of heart on these solemn occasions are generally expressed more by tears than words.

7th. Old Captain Klapmus attended the morning-service, and seemed affected both by Father Marsveld's sermon, and by the subsequent exhortations of the missionaries whom he visited.

Having, for the present, finished my engagements at Groenckloof, I resolved to accompany the missionaries going to Gnadenthal, but as part of our baggage was left at the Cape, and some other business required my presence in the town, I availed myself of the opportunity of a waggon going to fetch the goods, and set out in company of Brother Bonatz about sunset. At midnight, we made halt at Trefonteyn, and the wind being high and cold, had some trouble to get a fire lighted and coffee boiled under a bush, where we spent about two hours, while the oxen were feeding. The morning was fine, and I walked several miles. The Table-Mountain appears here so near, on the south side of the bay, that the hopes of soon reaching its foot made the journey round the head of the bay appear rather tedious, especially as the deep sand prevented much haste.

8th. On our arrival at Mr. Disandt's house, I found a letter from his Excellency the Governor, with an invitation for me to come and spend some days with him at Newlands. However, as a Dutch squadron had this morning arrived with troops, destined to take possession of Java, and other islands, restored to the Dutch by the English, and I was aware of the Governor's attention to the Admiral and officers, I went to the colonial office to inquire of Colonel Bird, how his Excellency was engaged. Here I met, both with the Governor himself and with H. Alexander, Esq. first colonial Secretary. An interesting conversation ensued on various subjects connected with our missionary establishments in the colony, during which his Excellency displayed great candour and willingness to render every assistance and remove every existing obstacle. He insisted on my dining with him at Newlands, and Mr. Alexander took me out and home in his phaeton. I met there Mr. Trutter, President of the Court of Justice, and his lady.

9th. Mr. Alexander, with whom we breakfasted, showed to Brother Bonatz and me his grounds, pointing out several particulars, in which the gardens in our settlements might be improved. I returned to him to dinner, where I had the pleasure to meet several gentlemen whose conversation was in a great degree interesting and instructive: Professor Reinward, going out with the Dutch fleet on a scientific tour to Java and other islands; Mr. Poleman, a medical gentleman of this town, of superior merit, whose acquaintance proved most agreeable and useful to me, during my stay at the Cape; Captain Hamilton, of the royal navy, an old acquaintance, who having accompanied Buonaparte to St. Helena, gave us a very interesting account of the voyage.

10th. Mr. Alexander having proposed to take me to Hottentot's Holland, and to show me some improvements, both on his own property and on some farms near Stellenbosch, which might be applied in our settlements, Brother Bonatz resolved to return with the waggon to Groenekloof, and with his party to meet me at Hottentot-Holland's Kloof. I spent part of the forenoon at the Secretary's office, where I had much previous conversation with Mr. Alexander respecting the extension of the Mission in the interior, and perceived with gratitude the readiness shown to forward the undertaking, as recommended by the Government at home, and to furnish me with every useful information,

To-day, I became acquainted with the Rev. Mr. Hesse, minister of the Lutheran church, a man universally and deservedly respected, and found in him a true friend and adviser. With him and his family I spent much time most agreeably, whenever I visited Capetown.

Calling on Mr. Poleman, he gave me an entertaining account of a journey he had made some time ago to a remarkable cavern in Kango, a part of the district of Zwellendam, from whence he had brought some very singular stalactites. It is, by his account, one of the largest and most curious subterranean excavations in the known world, whose vast chambers and dark recesses have not yet been fully explored. The stalactites in some of its halls are from sixteen to twenty-four feet in height, forming majestic groups of columns, supporting, in appearance, immense domes. Mr. Poleman, whose ardor led him to venture into many passages and cavities never yet visited, was in some places prevented from proceeding by huge dunghills made by innumerable hosts of bats, which covered the walls and ceilings of the horrid dungeon. Contrast the life, which these leathern-winged animals are doomed to suffer, with that of the feathered tribes, sporting in the unbounded regions of the air above us, and one might almost be led, by comparison, to form an idea of the difference between the states of condemned and happy spirits hereafter. I also visited Mr. Vilette's collection of the natural curiosities of this country. He stuffs birds, and preserves serpents and insects remarkably well.

11th. My intention to spend this day in writing and visiting some friends was frustrated, by Mr. Alexander's calling early to take me to Newlands to breakfast, at his Excellency's desire. As it appeared, that unreserved conversation with the Governor facilitated the business committed to me, I was glad of the opportunity to renew it; nor was I disappointed. After breakfast, we drove to Kerstenbosch, a country-house belonging to Mr. Alexander, at the foot of the rocky mountains south-west of Table Hill. The country is wild, well wooded, and exhibiting a rich profusion of curious shrubs and plants, some in flower. Rocks of singular shapes overhang the dark oak woods behind the house, and a cascade, issuing from the upper regions of these romantic hills, shoots down a dark glen. Among the woods and rocks wolves, jackals, and tygers, have a safe retreat. The soil is sandy, well watered, and consequently fruitful. The witteboom (silver-tree) grows here in abundance. After a short stay, we returned to town, passing through several new plantations of various kinds of trees, skirting the ascent towards the mountains, to the country-seat of the Honourable General Meade, Deputy Governor of the colony. It is situated in the vineyards, and has extensive gardens, in which some curious plants from Botany Bay and China, were cultivated with great care and success by the General, who is highly respected both in his military capacity, and as a man of great taste and science. His having left the colony has caused universal regret. I spent the afternoon with the Reverend Mr.

Hesse, who showed me the church and premises belonging to the Lutheran congregation in this place. It is but of late years, that the Dutch would permit the Lutherans to have an establishment at the Cape. The spirit of toleration, introduced with the English government, has now set them quite at liberty; and it redounds much to their honour, that, though a small congregation, and not rich, they have made a most comfortable provision for their minister, and spared no expense in erecting a handsome church and parsonage-house. Mr. Hesse's garden is filled with a great variety of singular plants, trees, and shrubs, the produce both of this, and other southern regions. In his botanical researches, which serve him as a relaxation from the laborious duties of his station, he is encouraged and assisted by the friendship and skill of his neighbour Mr. Poleman; and it were much to be wished, that men so eminently qualified, would favour the lovers of botany with the result of their discoveries in that delightful branch of natural history.

12th. This morning I had some conversation with the Reverend Mr. M'Kenny, of the methodist community. He has been sent out to form a society of that persuasion at the Cape; but meets with difficulties, as his commission does not seem to be a mission to the heathen, but chiefly to regard the white settlers. The Governor is willing to promote every attempt to introduce Christianity among the heathen; but to the multiplying of different religious sects at Capetown, many persons have great objections.

At noon, I set out with Mr. Alexander and his lady for Stellenbosch. His travelling waggon was drawn by eight mules. The road to the half-way-house is through deep sands and a wild waste, but in most places covered with bushes and flowering shrubs, which though the summer was far advanced, still showed themselves with considerable splendour. The people at the house cooked some victuals, which we had brought with us, being themselves unprepared for visitors. The nearer we approached the mountains, the more magnificent their rugged outline appeared, reminding me, both as to their height and general character, of the most picturesque part of the mountains of Cumberland and Westmoreland. The descent into Stellenbosch is long and tedious, and we did not reach the landdrost's house till after sunset. The landdrost, Mr. Van Rhyneveld was absent, but we met with a hospitable reception from the family. After tea, I accompanied Mr. Alexander to see some English friends. The moon shone bright, and the evening air was highly refreshing, after the heat of the day.

13th. I rose early, and walked out into the village. Nothing can be more delightful than the shady avenues planted in every street, defending the inhabitants and their dwellings from the burning rays of the sun. The Erste Revier is a swift-flowing torrent, issuing from a glen in the mountains above the town, and its bed a vast assemblage of large stones and pebbles, forming an embankment or beach on each side, showing what force and extent the river assumes, when swollen by heavy rains in the hills. I walked about for nearly two hours, and was much entertained by many surrounding objects, especially by the grotesque shapes of several hills and rocks in the grand chain. Returning, I stepped into the church, a plain building, in form of a cross, with an enormous door. It is furnished with chairs for the congregation, and a few pews for the men in office. An old organ adorns the west end. The landdrost's house is a handsome mansion, with spacious and well-furnished rooms. Some of the largest oaks I have seen in the colony overshadow its front.

After breakfast, we proceeded to the house of a wealthy farmer, Mr. Van der Byl, who showed us his vineyards, wine-press, cellars, gardens, and other premises. The family received us with great hospitality. Our road lay through the waste, along the great ridge of mountains, and presented us with beautiful scenery, especially wherever a farm-house, with its gardens and groves, furnished a foreground to the landscape. The next farm we visited was Mr. Meyburg's. The house and premises are well built, and the situation more pleasant than that we had just left. Our visit was but short, and we now made the best of our way to Hottentot's Holland. After fording the Erste Revier, we passed through the charming plantations of a farm, belonging to a Mrs. Morkel, and crossing a dreary waste, arrived about four o'clock at Mr. Alexander's own farm. I was surprised to find here a Hottentot waiting for me. Brother Bonatz and the travelling party having arrived this morning at the foot of Hottentot-Holland's Kloof, spent the heat of the day at a miserable inn, intending, on my arrival, to pass over the kloof in the cool of the evening. I joined them immediately after dinner. Father Marsveld and his wife had already set out on foot, and we followed with three waggons. The pedestrians met a herd of ten or twelve baboons on the road. The cowardly creatures betook themselves speedily to flight, and with astonishing dexterity and swiftness, scaled the steep, and to man, inaccessible cliffs, where they made a stand, till the cracks of the Hottentots' whips so frightened them, that they in an instant disappeared, but kept up a hideous yell for some time.

This kloof is celebrated in the journals of our missionaries for its difficult and steep ascent and the badness of the road. My imagination therefore had presented to me the picture of a formidable passage across these mountains, and I now found the accounts given by no means exaggerated. Twenty-four oxen having been sent from Gnadenthal to meet us, our complement had increased to fifty four, and it was with difficulty, that even this number drew the loaded waggons up the rugged road. The lower part of the hill is richly covered with grass, flowering shrubs, and bushes, but the upper region is a wild, solitary, and vast assemblage of rocks, thrown together without any appearance of regular strata.

After passing the summit, the descent is more gradual, and a fine full moon lighted us on our way to the first station, where we unyoked our oxen. We forded the Palmite river without difficulty, the water being low, and met five large waggons with fourteen oxen each, coming from the interior.

After taking some refreshment and rest, we proceeded about midnight, and made halt again at four o'clock in the morning. Part of our cattle were not with the waggons, but driven loose as relays. Among these a wolf descended from the mountain, and was choosing his prey, when he was observed by one of the Hottentots, and frightened away by the cracks of the long whip. The wolf of the Cape is a solitary, cowardly animal, when not impelled by hunger.

14th. We had now passed the great mountain called, the Haue Hoek, and again halted on the Botte Revier, where we breakfasted. Most of the company then retired into the waggons to sleep; but, always hoping to meet with some remarkable production of nature in this strange land, I walked along the banks of the river towards the hill. The country is dreary in the extreme. A solitary cottage attracted my attention, and making towards it, I overtook Sister Clemens examining the pebbles of various colours which cover part of the bank. They were fragments of sand-stone coloured by iron. We entered the cottage together, and found a friendly woman in it, with two slaves, and some black children. She informed us, that her relations lived on the other side, in two farm-houses. A slave-girl, who had been at Gnadenthal, offering to show us the way, conducted us across the river, over a rocky part of its bed, and through some vineyards and gardens, to the first house. Here an old Dutch farmer, with a grey beard of a week's growth, came out to meet us, but seemed not disposed to give us a friendly reception. At length, hearing that we came from the Cape, his curiosity to know, for what purpose a Dutch fleet had arrived in Table-Bay, made him ask us to sit down. Leaving his inhospitable dwelling, we walked on to the next farm, where our reception was very different. The good-natured housewife even asked us to pluck the fruit of some mulberry-trees, standing before her door. On our return, we found the black slave-girl waiting for us at the fording-place. She presented Sister Clemens with a nosegay of wild flowers, and very carefully helped her across the stony bed of the river.

When we again entered her mistress's hut, we were treated with some tea and goat's milk, Brother Lemmerz joining us, the family resolved to accompany us to the waggon to pay their respects to Brother Marsveld, whom they had seen at Gnadenthal. We found our venerable companion ready to receive them, and hope that they derived benefit from their meeting. After some usual inquiries, he spoke most affectionately with the woman, her slaves, and children, of the necessity of conversion, and that blessedness which is to be found in communion with the Lord Jesus. His address was heard with much attention, and drew tears from their eyes. It proved to us all a most edifying morning-service.

The Hottentots and their cattle not being yet ready to proceed, Brother Lemmerz accompanied me on a second walk down the river, till the steepness of its banks arrested our progress. The country has a most comfortless appearance. To the south, lies a chain of hills, among which the Tower of Babel is the highest. They are all barren, and chiefly rock. At length our phlegmatic drivers thought proper to proceed, but after three hours, on account of the heat, they halted again near a little valley, at the bottom of which flows a rivulet in the rainy season; but we now found only a few stagnant pools. Here I continued my researches, and saw the first land-tortoise, of the species called by the Dutch, Patlooper, from their generally keeping on the path-way or carriage-road. It was about four inches square, of a greenish colour, the compartments of its shell fringed with brown and yellow. Small broken fragments of white opaque quartz are here everywhere mixed with the iron and sand-stone, gravel, and pebbles. In the evening, we halted again, and proceeding slowly, arrived towards morning at the farm of a Mr. Kleim, a German, who gave us a very friendly reception. Here the road to Gnadenthal, turns to the left.

15th. As soon as the day dawned, we saw ourselves surrounded by the same dreary country as before. Very few shrubs and low bushes enclose the Serjeant's River in the valley, but the mountains begin to show themselves to greater advantage. To the right lies the Zwarteberg or Black-Mountain, under the south side of which the Warm-bath is situated. It is high, with many dells and gullies among its rocky steepes. Before us, the higher and very picturesque range of hills, among which the great Bavian's mountain (or Gnadenthal mountain) is the most conspicuous, afforded a noble and interesting prospect. It somewhat resembles the higher ranges of the Cumberland and Westmoreland hills in the neighbourhood of Winandermere and Brathay vale, but its foot is not clothed with the rich verdure and beautiful plantations, with which our English vallies and the ascents of our hills abound. If we were impatient to reach the end of our journey, our oxen seemed more so, for on being again yoked to the waggon, the Hottentots could hardly keep them from going off in a wild gallop. They almost ran over the boys, who led the foremost. As the shaft-oxen cannot keep a waggon back on a steep descent, and a drag-chain does not always answer the purpose on these rough roads, the way of the Hottentots is, to tack down a hill. To a traveller, not accustomed to it, it appears rather dangerous to be driving among the heath, high bushes, mole-hills, and ants' nests, where in England there would be a certainty of oversetting, especially in turning so suddenly as these people do. But they guide fourteen or sixteen oxen with the greatest skill; and the length of the waggons, yielding to the unevennesses of the road, keeps them upright, notwithstanding the violent jolting experienced by the travellers.

The approach to Gnadenthal and the Bavian's Kloof, which now opened to view, was to us all highly interesting and affecting. The road winds among low heathy hills, behind which the high mountains rise in various shapes, forming a bold outline. Within an English mile from the river Sonderend, we were met by about a hundred Hottentots, men, women, and children, on horseback and on foot, who came to bid us welcome, accompanied by the missionaries Leitner and Beinbrech. We alighted, and the people, placing themselves in a semicircle, sung a few verses, expressive of their joy and gratitude to God for bringing us safely across the ocean to this land. Having remounted the waggons, we proceeded with them and forded the river. The water reached to the middle of the bodies of our oxen.

Gnadenthal lies about an English mile from the ford, and as we drew nearer, the number of those, who came to meet us, every moment increased. The entrance into the village is through lanes enclosed by hedge-rows, and the dwellings of the missionaries appear under a grove planted by the first three Brethren, Marsveld, Schwinn, and Kuchnel, sometime after their arrival in 1792.

Little do I now wonder at the rapture, with which this place is spoken of by travellers, who, after traversing a dreary, uncultivated country, without a tree to screen them from the scorching rays of the sun, find themselves transported into a situation, by nature the most barren and wild, but now rendered fruitful and inviting, by the persevering diligence and energy of a few plain, pious, sensible, and judicious men, who came hither, not seeking their own profit, but that of the most despised of nations; and while they directed their own and their hearers' hearts to the dwellings of bliss and glory above, taught them those things, which have made even their earthly dwelling, comparatively, a kind of paradise, and changed filth and misery into comfort and peace.

The missionaries and their wives received us with the greatest kindness and hospitality, while a fresh company of Hottentots, standing under some venerable and wide-spreading oaks, which overshadow the court, welcomed us by singing a hymn, and by every token of affectionate regard. We joined with our whole hearts in their thanksgivings to God our Preserver, for the numberless favours received at His hands throughout the whole of our travels by land and sea.

GNADENTHAL lies about one hundred and twenty English miles from Capetown, in a direction nearly due east. It is the principal missionary settlement of the United Brethren in South Africa.

The Mission among the Hottentots was begun in 1737, by George Schmidt, a man of remarkable zeal and courage, who settled at this place, then known by the name of Bavians-Kloof.—The Hottentots heard the gospel with attention, and he soon collected a small Christian congregation. He taught the youth to read Dutch, and instructed the people in several useful arts. In 1744, leaving them to the care of a pious man, he went to Europe, with a view to represent the promising state of the Mission, and to return with assistants. But, to his inexpressible grief and disappointment, he was not permitted by the Dutch East India Company to resume his labours, some ignorant people having insinuated, that the propagation of Christianity among the Hottentots would injure the interests of the colony. Since that time, to the year 1792, the Brethren did not cease to make application to the Dutch Government for leave to send missionaries to the Cape, especially as they heard, that the small Hottentot congregation had kept together for some time, in earnest expectation of the return of their beloved teacher. Brother Schmidt had left a Dutch New Testament with them, which they read together for their edification.

At length, in 1792, by the mercy of God, and the kind interference of friends in the Dutch Government, leave was given to send out three missionaries, who, on their arrival, were willing, at the desire of the Governor, to go first to Bavians-Kloof, and there to commence their labours, on the same spot where Brother Schmidt had resided. Instructions from the Government in Holland directed them to chuse the place of their residence, wherever they might find it most convenient; but the circumstances of the colony at that time would not admit of it.

The English having made themselves masters of the colony in 1796, the Brethren were permitted to build a Church, and by the favour which the British Government has uniformly shown to the Brethren's Missions, they now remain undisturbed and protected in their civil and religious liberty.

In 1792 when the three missionaries, Henry Marsveld, Daniel Schwinn, and John Christian Kuehnelt came hither, they found an old woman, Helena, baptized by Brother Schmidt, still alive, who delivered to them the New Testament he had given her. But few vestiges of his dwelling remained. The place was a perfect wilderness; at present thirteen hundred Hottentots inhabit the village. The name Gnadenthal was given to it by the Dutch Governor Jansen,

We spent the first afternoon after our arrival, in walking through part of the settlement. Out of every house and hut, men, women, and children, came forth with friendly faces to meet us, and to testify their joy at our arrival. Having observed to some of the inhabitants, who live near the church, that the place before their houses was not kept in good order, and Brother Bonatz adding, that I was De Heer, of whom he had told them, that he would come from Europe to see them, and expected to find cleanliness and order established throughout the whole village, they fell to work, and in half an hour removed all the rubbish and ashes lying about their houses, promising, that I should never see such disorder again. We next went into the great garden, in the centre of which stands the celebrated pear-tree, planted by the late venerable missionary, George Schmidt, in 1738. Having in fifty-two years, during the suspension of the mission, grown to a vast size, it served the Brethren, in 1792, both for a church and school, the people and their children sitting under the shade of its wide-spreading branches. Some symptoms of decay at its top, had made pruning necessary, which has lessened its size, but it is now quite alive and sound. The burial-ground lies west of the garden, a double row of oaks sheltering it towards the north. It is divided into four equal compartments, at present comprehending about three hundred graves of Hottentots, in regular rows, each distinguished by a piece of wood, marked with a number, referring to the church-books, as at Groenekloof.

From hence we walked into the glen, called Bavians-Kloof, from its having formerly been the resort of a great number of baboons. But since the inhabitants of the valley have multiplied, these creatures have retired to more desolate parts of the mountains, and but seldom make their appearance, except when peaches and other garden-fruits are getting ripe. A lively brook, called the Bavians-Revier, issues from the glen, and, flowing through the village, falls into the river Sonderend, not far from the ford.

In the evening, about four hundred Hottentots attended the service at the church, and after a suitable address by Brother Bonatz, joined in a hymn of praise to God, for having brought us safe to this place. When we delivered the salutations sent by the congregations of the Brethren in Germany and England, to the converts from among the Hottentots, with best wishes for an increase of every blessing upon them and their nation, loud thanksgivings followed. To us new-comers, it was a truly gratifying and affecting sight, to see so large a number of Christian Hottentots assembled together, and to hear them, with heart and voice, joining in the worship of Him, with whom there is no respect of persons, but whose grace and mercy are free to all of every tribe and nation, who humbly seek his face.

I was very comfortably lodged, and cannot but here acknowledge, with gratitude, the kindness of the widow of the late missionary Philip Kohrhammer. She had retired to a small chamber in an out-house, and insisted on my taking possession of her room in the mission-house.

16th. When I awoke in the morning, I could hardly believe, that I was actually at Gnadenthal; a place, which for so many years has been the subject of my thoughts and my prayers; of which I have so long delighted to speak and write, and which I have so often visited in spirit. It was my most fervent wish and prayer, that the Lord would make this visit profitable to my own soul; and, if I might be thus highly favoured, beneficial to the cause I came to to serve.

Immediately after breakfast, I went into the church. From without, its appearance by no means exhibits the classical taste of the architect: but it is imposing by its size, the thickness of its walls, which are of unburnt brick, plastered and yellow-washed, its arched windows, its high roof, and its gable-ends, serrated or finished in short steps, with a vane on the point of each. In short, it looks like nothing else, and its general character immediately pronounces it to be a place of worship. The height of its roof makes it a very conspicuous object in approaching the valley from every side, and nothing is wanting but a slender turret in the centre of the roof of about twenty or thirty feet in height, to give it all the appearance of an ancient ecclesiastical building. The doors are, in my opinion, on the wrong side. It should turn its main front to the village, whereas, now, it faces the grove and the missionaries' dwellings. Two arched windows are placed between the doors, and one between each door and the gable-end. The front towards the village has arched windows. The arches over the doors are glazed. On entering the building, I was agreeably struck with its neatness and cleanliness. Two columns, about a yard in diameter, support the immense roof, and at first sight, surprise every beholder. That thickness was thought necessary, as they are constructed of unburnt brick. They resemble the plainest Saxon columns in some of our cathedrals. The chalky material used here for white-wash, which comes from a place near the sea-coast, called Karst Revier, has a peculiar brightness, contributing much to the cheerful look of this temple. The body of the church, with the gallery, which occupies three of its sides, will hold upwards of a thousand persons. The front of the gallery is supported by iron bars, pendant from the beams in the ceiling. The latter is not plastered, but is a neat flooring of yellow-wood upon a joist. The plain outside of the gallery, is relieved by a very simple, but ingenious contrivance. Upright boards, shaped like pilasters, are nailed upon the horizontal planks, which give the whole a finished appearance. The minister's table is, I think, inconveniently placed between the two entrances. On Sundays, it is converted into a species of pulpit, by placing a high desk upon it. The whole is covered with green cloth, and elevated on a step above the floor. This step runs the whole length from door to door, under the seats of the missionaries. The space under the gallery at the east-end, is boarded off, as a small vestry, used only as a waiting room for the officiating minister, and to dress, previous to the holy sacrament. The church is lighted by three lamps, hanging, one in the centre, and one on each side, in a line with the columns. The congregation sit on benches, the men on the east, the women on the west-side of the building; both below, and in the gallery, a space of about two yards down the middle, forms a passage between them; at the bottom of which stands another large table, used at the communion, and in the meetings for instruction and catechisation, when those present turn with their faces towards it.

The belfry, which, after the arrival of the English, the missionaries were permitted to build, stands in the middle of the grove. It is an arch, supported by substantial pilasters, whitened, and a pleasant object. The sound of the bell may be heard a good way down the valley. It is used for every purpose of call, to church, to school, or to meals, and consequently is sometimes rung eight or nine times in the day.

From my first entrance into Gnadenthal, I determined to lose no opportunity of obtaining a complete knowledge, both of its inward and outward state, and of contributing, to the best of my power, by advice and assistance, towards its prosperity. I therefore began immediately to consult the missionaries in what manner my time might be most profitably spent in this service. Besides many conferences with reference to the internal and spiritual concerns of the Mission, we were led to consider the necessity of making various improvements, as far as our slender means would permit. The missionaries, who had accompanied me hither, found no dwellings provided for them, and were rather uncomfortably lodged in the garden-house, the gardening tools having been previously removed, and at the inn, a house kept by a Hottentot, and chiefly used by farmers visiting the settlement, to refresh themselves and their horses, for a few hours, but seldom as a night's lodging. The resident missionaries, having each only one room for himself and family, could not possibly take them in. An additional building, therefore, seemed indispensably necessary; and we resolved to build a house, in a line with the school and smithy, which should contain three rooms and a joiner's shop.

Brother Peter Leitner was intrusted with the commission; and on the Hottentot congregation being informed of the resolution, fifteen masons offered their services. A sufficient number of hands were soon engaged; some to cut reed for thatching, others to assist in making unburnt bricks; and in a short time, the foundation was laid, according to the plan agreed on. I had here an opportunity of observing a feature in the character of the Hottentots. It is true, that from affection and gratitude to the missionaries, they will engage to work: if, however, they have no relish for it themselves, they are apt to go about it rather sluggishly. But if the work please them, which was here the case, no European workmen exceed them in spirit and diligent attention; only the execution must not last too long, lest, like children, they begin to get tired of it. They are flattered and pleased when visited by their employers while at work, particularly if the latter take some share in it, and now and then lend assistance, if only by removing a stone, or helping to lift a beam.

Before dinner, two English officers of dragoons arrived on a visit. They appeared highly pleased with the whole settlement; particularly with the neatness and regularity of the missionaries' dwellings, the convenience and cleanliness of the church, and the number of trees, both upon the premises, and dispersed throughout the village. It gave me pleasure to accompany them in their walk, and to satisfy their inquiries after the origin and aim of the institution.

In the evening-meeting, Brother Marsveld delivered a very animated discourse on the text of the day. I was surprised to find him still able to speak with so much energy and strength of recollection in spiritual things.

17th. We rose at the first sound of the bell, which rings at half past five. At that time the family meet in the dining-room, read the texts of Scripture appointed for the day, sing some verses generally out of hymns connected with their contents, or any other morning-hymn, and then take a dish of coffee; but what they call breakfast is not ready till eight o'clock, and more like a luncheon. Very little time is spent at their meals. Between twelve and one they dine; drink tea or coffee at two; sup between six and seven, and go to the church at eight, when the whole congregation meet for evening-worship. Every day, however, has its regular meetings for one or other division of the congregation, for instruction in the Christian doctrines. The schools are held in the forenoon for the boys, and in the afternoon for the girls.

After breakfast, Brother Bonatz walked with me into the village, when we entered about a dozen houses. The village consists at present of two hundred and fifty-six cottages and huts, containing twelve hundred and seventy-six inhabitants. The dwellings are differently constructed. Some of the new people who are permitted to reside here on trial, or the poorest of the inhabitants, put up a hut, made with a few upright poles, between which there is a wattling of reeds or rushes, or a species of slender cane. Again, others have walls of unburnt brick, or wattling covered with a clay plastering, with square doors and windows, and a well-thatched roof. None of them are fond of too much light; and generally one window, or at most two, serves for the whole house, before which not unfrequently hangs a curtain of sheep-skin to prevent any intrusion of the sun's rays.

Each house has a garden belonging to it, and the state of the garden generally betrays the disposition of the inhabitant. Some are kept neat, and produce good crops; others, though not many, are full of weeds. The missionary upon whom this branch of service devolves, after exercising due patience in admonishing and warning the possessor, may deprive him of it, and give it to another. Most of the gardens, however, look well; and being separated from each other by low hedges or bushes, the whole valley appears well clothed with verdure.

In some of the dwellings, the children of the poor, particularly the little boys, go naked; and some of the men wear only karosses and aprons, after the old Hottentot fashion. But those that have better earnings, soon provide themselves with jackets and trowsers, and other articles of European dress, which they always wear on Sundays, clothing their children in linen or calico shirts, trowsers, or petticoats. The head-dress of the women is a handkerchief, neatly infolding their heads, above the ears, with a loop in front, and looks well.

On each side of the valley, the cottages are placed in rows; but the rest are irregularly distributed between them. Though at first I had joined others in regretting, that, from the beginning, no regular plan had been followed throughout, by degrees I became pleased with the romantic irregularity of the interior part of the settlement, when, as I walked among the hedges on a serpentine foot-path, I unexpectedly met with a snug cottage under cover of quince, fig, and other fruit-trees, and an assemblage of women and children sitting at work under their shade; then, after some friendly conversation, passing on, I again surprised another family with a visit. In one of the huts, Brother Bonatz desired a poor boy, dressed only in a kaross and apron, to read some verses in the bible to me, which he did without hesitation.

At three o'clock in the afternoon, a pretty large congregation of communicants attended the confirmation of a Hottentot woman, previous to her first participation of the Holy Communion. Father Schwinn officiated, and delivered an edifying discourse on the aim of that sacred ordinance. I took afterwards a walk with Brother Lemmerz, into a part of the settlement on the eminence beyond the Bavians-Revier, called the Caffre-Kraal, being inhabited chiefly by Christian Caffres. These people were admitted as inhabitants at Gnadenthal before the late disturbances; and when all the Caffres were banished the colony, and obliged to retreat across the Great Fish River, those belonging to the Brethren's Mission obtained leave from Government to remain here, and have always conducted themselves in the most peaceable and orderly manner. Some of them are distinguished by their exemplary conduct. They differ in features and in habits from the Hottentots; but here, associate with them in perfect amity.

From thence we went into a kloof or valley called Siebenfonteyn, at the bottom of the ascent towards the great mountain, where we found a very good house and garden. The wife of the possessor, with whom we had some conversation, seemed a pious, sensible woman.

To-day I heard with much pleasure a party of men and women, employed as day-labourers in the missionaries' garden, both before and after their meal, which they enjoyed in the shade of the grove, most melodiously singing a verse, by way of a grace. One of the women sung a correct second, and very sweetly performed that figure in music, called Retardation  from which I judge, that dissonants are not the invention of art, but the production of nature. Nothing would be more easy, than to form a chorus of the most delightful voices, in four parts, from among this smooth-throated nation.

18th. After breakfast, Sister Bonatz brought a christian Caffre woman into my room, who had expressed a particular wish to speak to me. I desired her to sit down, which, after some hesitation, she did on a low stool, as is their custom, and Sister Bonatz being interpreter, said, that she came to beg, that we would send teachers to her nation, who were in the dark, ignorant of God, and of that happiness in Jesus, which she, though so unworthy, experienced, and consequently given up as a prey to every kind of sin and evil. On this subject she delivered herself with a kind of fervour and eloquence, which would have done credit to the most civilized orator. She spoke with great humility of the mercy shown to herself, of the privilege she enjoyed of living among a people of God, of her ardent desire, that her own brother and sister, and all her country-people, should experience the same; and entreated, that they might not be forgotten. She was afraid, "that perhaps the teachers might leave off praying for them." She had, however, found a text of Scripture which revived her hopes: "I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not." Is. xlii. 16. She would therefore yet hope "that our Saviour would send to them His word, and call them to partake of His salvation." I answered, that I could assure her, that her countrymen were not forgotten by the Fathers and Brethren in Europe, and that I had been particularly commissioned to make inquiry about the practicability of establishing a Mission in her country; but having spoken with the Governor and other persons in office, I was given to understand, that just now, it would not be safe, while the war lasted. She replied, that the boors were in fault, but she hoped that the war would soon cease, and then that something would be done for them. She thought "that the best way to begin a Mission would be, to send one or more Caffres to king T^cGeika, and inform him of the aim of such an institution, and though she believed, that just now the Caffres might kill the boors for robbing them of their land, they would protect missionaries coming from Gnadenthal; that a settlement might be formed, by the Caffre part of this congregation becoming the first settlers in any part of their country, suitable for the purpose, and that, if a mission were begun, and succeeded, there would be an end of all Caffre wars with the English." The name of this woman is Wilhelmina, a communicant, and in her person, manner, and neatness of apparel, superior to any of the Hottentots. I was much pleased and edified by her conversation.

It is the common custom, in this warm climate, for every person who can afford the time, to take a nap after dinner, and I was advised to do the same, under an idea, that without it there is too much waste of strength. To-day, I walked after dinner into the great garden, and sat down under George Schmitt's pear tree, when I began to feel drowsy. I retired therefore into my room, to try the effect of the advice given me, but when called to coffee, felt so much stupified by the attempt, that I ever after resisted it, and generally walked about the premises after dinner, or employed the time in drawing, by the help of the camera obscura, nor did I ever feel inconvenience from wakefulness. I walked this afternoon with Brother Lemmerz to the new vineyard in Kornland's-Kloof, which promises to yield an abundant crop. By the way we called on several Hottentots in their houses.

19th. The greater part of this day was spent in conference on different subjects. During an early walk, I was much delighted by watching some thin and almost transparent summer clouds skimming along the upper region of rocks on the great mountain. The shades and tints of the lower cliffs were charmingly variegated as illumined by the rays of a bright morning sun. In the afternoon, all the new-comers went with Brother Bonatz on a visit to the Hottentots and Caffres beyond the Bavians-Revier.

20th. After dinner, word was brought that a communicant, Stephen, had received so severe a blow in his stomach by the kick of a horse, that his life was in danger. I accompanied Brother Bonatz to see him. We found him lying on his breast, under a hedge, with four or five women sitting near him. Some men had conveyed him thus far on a bed-stead, when, not able to bear the motion, he begged to be put down. We encouraged him to endeavour to rise; and, after he had taken some medicine, four stout men carried him to his dwelling, but the door being too narrow to admit the bed-stead, they conveyed him into the stable. He was in great agony, and his case truly pitiable. His wife had just been delivered. They were extremely poor, and had four young children alive; one was lately drowned. They spoke of their complicated distress, with resignation to the will of God, and poor Stephen expressed his conviction, that he should depart out of this world, praying that the Lord would have mercy on him and take him to himself. On our return, something was sent for the relief of the patient.

In the evening, I walked with Brother Lemmerz into the Kloof. We worked our way through the bushes towards a rocky eminence, from which I hoped to gain a view of the division made in the upper part of the kloof by four round hillocks, but was disappointed. A number of children of both sexes were employed in getting firewood, all with naked feet, and not half dressed, fearing neither thorns, sharp stones, nor serpents, which are not unfrequently met with. The stone throughout the kloof is sand-stone, generally of a reddish hue, intersected by veins of white quartz, here and there imperfectly chrystalized. The rocks appear as if they were put together of fragments of various sizes. Some of their ledges are covered with beautiful shrubs, and the partridge aloë grows everywhere in great perfection.

This evening, a chest with Dutch bibles and Testaments, a present from the British and Foreign Bible Society, arrived, to the great joy of the missionaries and the Hottentots. In the evening-service, I was more than ever charmed with the voices of the congregation.

Before I proceed in my narrative, it may be proper to give an account of some of the internal regulations of the missionary settlements of the United Brethren, which are the same in every country. The gospel is preached to all heathen, to whom the missionaries can gain access, and every one invited to be reconciled to God, through the atonement made by Jesus Christ. Besides the public testimony of the gospel, the missionaries are diligently employed in visiting and conversing with the heathen in their dwellings. If any come to the missionaries for further instruction, giving in their names, they are called New People, and special attention is paid to them. If their subsequent conduct proves their sincerity, and they desire to be initiated into the Christian Church by Holy Baptism, they are considered as Candidates for Baptism, and, after previous instruction, and a convenient time of probation, baptized. In admitting them to the Holy Communion, they are first permitted to be once present as spectators, and called Candidates for the Communion; and after some time, become Communicants. Each of these divisions have separate meetings, in which they are instructed in all things relating to a godly life and walk. Separate meetings are also held with other divisions of the congregation; with the children, the single men, the single women, the married people, the widowers, and widows, in which the admonitions and precepts given in the Holy Scriptures for each state of life are inculcated. Every member of the congregation is expected to come, at stated seasons, to converse with the missionaries; the men with a missionary, and the women with his wife, by which a more perfect knowledge of the individuals is gained, and an opportunity afforded to each, to request and receive special advice. From among the most approved of the people of both sexes, Assistants are appointed in large congregations, who visit the sick, make reports to the missionaries, and help to maintain order. Others are employed as Chapel-servants, who take their turn in attendance.

21st. In the afternoon, the chapel-servants had a meeting, as usual in the beginning of the year, the aim of which is, to encourage them to diligence and faithfulness in their service. The conversation was free, unaffected, and edifying. Many of them, both men and women, joined in it with great modesty. Father Marsveld, after a short address, asked some questions concerning their service, and their views in accepting of the appointment. Their answers surprised and delighted me. They proved, that these people, lately so ignorant, had, by the instruction, not of men, but of the Spirit of God, conceived views and ideas of the service in the house of God more just, than many who think themselves far more enlightened. Their spirit seemed truly that of David, who would rather be a door-keeper in the house of the Lord, than dwell in the tents of the wicked. One said, that he felt so unworthy of being thus employed, that when he rose to snuff the candles, he almost trembled, lest he should do any thing to disturb the congregation or the teacher. The conversation turned also upon brotherly love, and a willingness to help each other in trouble or sickness, which is not natural to the Hottentots. This gave occasion to many practical observations, and my quoting the simile used in Scripture, of the intimate connexion of the members of the body, that if one suffer, the whole is affected, with explanations given by some of the missionaries present, seemed to make a deep impression upon them. They with one consent expressed their thankfulness for having received more teachers, and for my visit. Father Marsveld's manner in leading the conversation, was that of a sensible parent addressing sensible children. To me, this opportunity of noticing the disposition of the Hottentots, when converted to Christ, was singularly agreeable and important. Shortly after, they all came into my room, to pay me a special visit, and once more to bid me welcome. The camera obscura happening to stand in a position, which showed the church and the grove, with people passing and repassing, exceedingly amused and astonished them.

A messenger now announced that Stephen was in a dying state, and Brother Bonatz immediately went to see him once more, but on arriving at the house, found that he had just breathed his last. The case of this poor man and his family distressed and disturbed my mind. Both he and his wife were worthy members of the congregation, and now, in the midst of family troubles, they are separated, when the assistance of the husband seemed most needed.

As Sunday is generally a day, on which strangers attend divine worship, or visit the settlement, the Holy Communion is always held in the evening, when there are no intruders. At half past seven the communicant congregation assembled in the church. What shall I say of this solemnity! I wished all my friends, who take share in the success of the Missions of our Church, to be present. What a miracle is here wrought by the power of God, through the simple preaching of the word of the Cross! What must the feelings of those men be, who first were employed in the renewal of this Mission, no longer ago than in 1792, when they behold the effects of their labours. I made this remark to Father Marsveld. His answer was—"It is so clearly the work of God, and not of " man, that we almost forget, that we have at all been employed " in it. When we came hither, our utmost hope was, that we " might perhaps, in a course of years, see forty or fifty Hotten-
 " tots converted and formed into a Christian congregation; and as " we were travelling towards this place, we prayed to our Saviour,
 " that He might bless and support us; and if He granted us
 " the favour to see but one soul converted in truth, we should " think ourselves well rewarded. And now, when we behold
 " what He has done, we are indeed overwhelmed with gratitude " and amazement: but not unto us, not unto us, to His name al-
 " lone be all the glory and all the praise." This was likewise the constant expression of Father Schwinn: he once said to me of his own accord, "We are unprofitable servants and sinful men; we " have done many things amiss, and have nothing to boast of, but " mercy. The Lord forgave us our sins, healed every breach, and " helped us to serve Him with gladness from day to day, while we “ beheld the effects produced by the power of His Word and Spirit.” That venerable apostle, George Schmidt, and Father Kùehnel, are in heaven, rejoicing before the throne of the Lamb over the success of the faithful labours of God’s servants on earth.

But to return to the celebration of the Lord’s supper. The devotion and fervour, with which the Hottentots present attended to the service, and received the sacred elements, were peculiarly striking to my mind. Their singing was melodious, but rather too soft. I was told in apology, that not-all of them were acquainted with the hymns sung by the minister who officiated. A Post-Communion followed, for such as had been necessarily prevented from attending before, by family duties, watching, or other hindrances. I retired to my room, rather overwhelmed by the feelings and reflections of my mind, and with a heart filled with thankfulness to God our Saviour for such a manifestation of his power and grace as I had just witnessed. It may appear like enthusiasm, but I asked no longer, “ Am I really and bodily in Gnadenthal?” but, “ Am I yet on earth?”

22d. Having promised Brother Leitner, that I would accompany him to-day on a visit to his wife, who had for some weeks been confined by illness at the Warm-bath near Caledon, we prepared to leave Gnadenthal immediately after the morning-service, which, on the day following the celebration of the Holy Communion, is a Liturgy for thanksgiving. I was astonished to see the church well filled, and all the communicants yet in their Sunday’s dress, neat and clean. If some of my Cape friends, who often describe the Hottentots as an incorrigible set of lazy, dirty, and ragged creatures, were to see this congregation on such occasions, they would at least say, that here, facts do not prove their assertion true. At the Communion, most of the women are dressed in clean white gowns. Both men and women save their best apparel, that they may appear decent at church on Sundays, but there is no affectation of finery among them.

We set off in our own waggon and ten oxen, for the Warm-bath, Brother Thomsen accompanying us. The weather was fine, and the haze hovering about the middle region of the mountains, only served to make their outline and the distances of different ridges more distinct. I have nowhere seen any chain of mountains of a more picturesque and imposing appearance. Some of the low heathy hills, forming the valley in which Gnadenthal lies, have fanciful shapes, and rocky ledges about half way up the ascent. At Klemm's farm, we made but a short stay, and proceeded on the Cape road for about eight English miles, when we turned to the left, towards the Zwarteberg. This is a bleak mountain of moderate height, furrowed, as it were, with rocky kloofs on the north side. The chief amusement on these journies is the contemplation of the singular ranges of hills, which form the horizon. On doubling the west corner of the Zwarteberg, a high mountain, called the Tower of Babel, presents itself with much grandeur.

The town or village of Caledon is but as a sapling rising out of the ground, the houses are neat, and the church in form of a cross, without a steeple. The circumjacent country is naked, and a barren waste, excepting a few green spots of cultivation in the vale.

The Warm-baths are about one English mile beyond the town, under the south declivity of the mountain. We were welcomed by our friends and Dr. Hassner, the proprietor of the baths, with great cordiality; the latter conducted me to his house, where I met with a very hospitable reception, and excellent accommodations. Some friends came and spent an hour with us.

23d. I rose early, intending to try the effect of the warm bath, and found it the best possible remedy both against the rheumatism, and the prickly heat, which still haunted me. After breakfast with Brother Leitner's family, Dr. Hassner took me in his curricule to Caledon, where we waited upon the deputy-landdrost, Mr. Von Frauenfelder. Our friends followed us on foot. It proved a very pleasant visit; the landdrost showed us the church, and the prison, here called the Tronk. Having also paid our respects to the minister, the Rev. Mr. Voss, we returned to dinner.

The efficacy of the warm baths is universally acknowledged by all who have used them, both inhabitants of this colony, and invalids from the East Indies. After dinner, we visited the hot springs. They are situated in an eminence behind the new bathing-house. The principal one proceeds from an opening, about a foot and a half wide, the depth of which is not yet ascertained. The temperature of the water is 118° Fahrenheit at the spring, and 112 in the bath. Between two hot springs a cold spring rises, which has water of a different quality, and comparatively extremely cold. The soil on this part of the mountain is a black mould, as fine as powder. Shrubs and plants cover it and prevent its being carried off by the wind. It is but shallow, and lies upon a crust of iron-stone of singular texture, porous, bulbous, and its fissures in some parts filled with a glistening substance. Most of it appears to have passed through fire; here and there showing decomposition, and yielding a bright yellow ochre. I have called it a crust of iron-stone, because it sounds hollow under one's feet, as though it covered a vacuum, which, however, is not Dr. Hassner's opinion, but rather, that it is elastic. In one place, an opening or chasm appears, which is said to have been occasioned by an eruption. On our return, we visited the old baths, higher up the hill.

In the evening, Dr. Hassner gave me a detailed description of the loss of the Arniston East Indiaman off Cape Agullas, which happened about the end of May 1815. The catastrophe was terrific. About three hundred souls perished, among whom were Lord and Lady Molesworth, with other persons of high character. I could hardly fall asleep, so deep was the impression made upon my mind by the Doctor's eloquent account of the horror of this scene.

24th. After breakfast, Brother Thomsen accompanied me to some eminences in front of the buildings, of which, and of the village, I made a sketch. On my return, we were visited by Mr.

Hoetz, a merchant, and by the landdrost of Caledon. Sister Leitner being rather better in health, the company spent the day very pleasantly together. After tea, I set out with Brother Thomsen to examine the rocky summit of the Zwarteberg. Beyond the iron-stone region, quartz is found in abundance; innumerable flowers and shrubs of great variety grow among the rocks, and a botanist finds here a rich harvest.

The mountain is very properly called the Zwarteberg, or the Black Mountain, for it is an assemblage of black, barren, rocky hillocks, rising one above the other in strange confusion, inhabited only by jackals, wolves, tygers, and serpents.

We were insensibly led from one eminence to the other, enjoying the prospect on all sides, and amusing ourselves with the contemplation of the plants, here and there luxuriantly growing between the stones, on a very thin covering of earth, when the setting sun reminded us of the necessity of returning by the shortest path. This we missed, and got among broken rocks, where almost every step was attended with danger. We supped all together at the baths, and I found the conversation of my worthy host so interesting, that I did not retire to rest, till after midnight.

25th. About half past six, we took leave of our old and new acquaintances, with prayers for the speedy recovery of our worthy friend, Sister Leitner, and took the road along the south side of the Zwarteberg. The country is mostly barren, without a tree or bush to clothe its brown surface. Not a green spot is seen, excepting where, in the bed of some torrent, descending from the precipitous declivity of the mountain, a little moisture has been left behind. The Zwarteberg stretches about ten English miles, in a south-west and north-east direction, and is perfectly barren.

We passed through a farm, where, by an act of justice, formerly unknown in this country, the possessors have been taught, that English law admits of no respect of persons; but when administered according to the constitution, provides security and justice for the lowest, as well as the highest ranks of society. The wife, with the assistance of her daughter, a girl of about eighteen years of age, had most unmercifully beaten a female slave in their service, though with child, wounding her from head to foot. Complaints of this act of barbarity having been brought before the Judge, at the circuit, lately established in this colony, and the cruel perpetrators being found guilty, they were condemned to pay three hundred rix-dollars fine, two thousand rix-dollars costs of suit, and that their slaves should all be sold, but not to one of their family. The farm appeared in a very delapidated state.

Some Hottentot women belonging to Gnadenthal, being at work in the field, ran towards our waggon, expressed in the most friendly manner their joy at seeing their teachers, and delivered some little commissions to our driver and leader for their friends and families. I was vastly pleased with this rencontre. We halted at a farm, where the family gave us a friendly reception. I had been all day troubled with violent headach, but was cured by some hot tea, which, though proceeding from a dirty pewter urn, with sops of spider's legs, and fragments of the wings and bodies of flies, gave me almost immediate relief: whether owing to the decoction of these particles of insects, to the heat of the water, or any other cause, I waited not to examine, but felt thankful for my recovery.

The road now turned towards the Gnadenthal mountains, which, from some eminences, had a truly magnificent appearance. We visited a farmer of the name of Kuntz, whom we found in an ailing state: he however came down and conversed with us. His farm lies along a pretty valley, with an everflowing stream, and a considerable tract of land under cultivation: the house is large and roomy, and some of the ceilings are made of a fine yellow or olive-coloured wood from Ceylon. We now moved slowly towards our home, on bad roads and with weary cattle, but delighted with the prospect; and about eight o'clock arrived in the shady recesses of Gnadenthal, the very sight of which affords comfort in this hot and sultry region.

26th. After breakfast, Brother Clemens accompanied me into the garden, the burial-ground, and other premises, when I mentioned to him some ideas of improvement, by which regularity and beauty might, in my opinion, be much furthered, at a small expense. But I will candidly confess, that by the time I had been a few months in Africa, and become better acquainted with the difficulties presenting themselves on all sides, in promoting improvement, both moral and physical, I was rather disposed to stand astonished at what had been done, in so short a time, by our Brethren in this place, and at Groenckloof, than to expect immediate attention to my suggestions. Those venerable men, Marsveld and Schwinn, heard my remarks with great patience and forbearance, as they were never made, but under a conviction of my being a novice, and with all due and unfeigned deference to their better judgment. I also saw an improvement, which pleased me. We visited the people who were cutting and drying peaches in the missionaries' garden. Formerly the fruit was laid upon a platform constructed of broom, fastened to, and supported by uprights fixed in the ground. If it rained long, the peaches were spoiled, as they could not be removed, and the platform itself suffered great damage during the wet season. The Brethren were now gradually introducing moveable racks or platforms, made of bamboo and reed wattling, and placed loose on a frame, which could be easily taken off, and with the load of fruit carried into a dry shed, and when not in use stowed away in a small compass.

In the forenoon, we met in conference. Thirty-four persons were appointed for advance in church-privileges, from a list of about fifty under consideration. After dinner, they were called by the chapel-servants into the dining-room; first, those to be admitted among the candidates for baptism; then, the persons to be baptized, and lastly, some, who, having been baptized as children, were to be received into the congregation. After being informed of the advance they were to make, they were earnestly exhorted to walk worthy of the grace conferred upon them. The answers given to the very solemn questions put to them, were generally clear, and evidently proceeding from their hearts. I could not but admire the manner in which this service was conducted by the presiding missionary.

To-day I attended a meeting of the men for instruction in the Christian doctrines, in which Father Schwinn, besides asking some questions in the way of catechisation, delivered a very animated discourse. From the church I proceeded to the school, where Brother Lemmerz was introduced to the boys as their future school-master. They took leave of his predecessor, Brother Leitner, and promised obedience, by giving their hands. A class was then called, that I might hear them spell and read, which they did very well, considering that the vacation, during the harvest, always brings with it some forgetfulness of what has been learned. Some of the poor boys come to school in their karosses and aprons, others are dressed in linen jackets and trowsers. The school-house is a very convenient, roomy building. As I had brought with me a present of bibles and testaments from the British and Foreign Bible Society, I took this opportunity of speaking to the children, and observing, that I should be glad, on my return, to be able to inform that venerable society, that they were well bestowed.

In the evening, the Liturgy, or hymn, treating of our Saviour's sufferings, appointed in our Church for Friday evening's worship, was sung in a spirit of humble thankfulness for our redemption. This is the grand subject, which has proved the means of conversion, civilization, and happiness in time and eternity, to believers of every tribe and nation. May it be and remain our constant theme, in spite of either a deriding world, or the vain conceits and specious arguments of such, as pretend to superior insight, and think that they have found something higher and more effectual.

I have seen to-day much of the course of a missionary station, where there are many descriptions of persons to attend to; and I am convinced, that if a missionary does his duty, there is occasion for the exertion of all the energies of mind and body. May we always be favoured with missionaries, who can say with truth: "The Love of Christ constraineth us."

27th. I spent the forenoon at my desk. After dinner, while others were taking their African nap, which does not yet agree with me, I took a walk about the premises, and ascended the hill to the right, coming out of the kloof. My intention was to seek a spot, from whence a view might be taken of the missionaries' premises, showing the church, a part of every house, and the garden. On my return, finding the church-door open, I entered and climbed in to the roof. Here I found two Hottentots at work, who gave me some information about the building. The timber used was allowed by Government to be cut in the forest of Soete Melks Valley. After coffee, the Brethren Clemens and Lemmerz went with me into the kloof. On the road we were called to by some Hottentots, who had just caught a tree-serpent. It was a beautiful creature, about four feet long, mottled grey on the back, with a gold-yellow belly. These reptiles are said to be very venomous, and haunt trees and bushes. After a most pleasant walk, we returned, admiring the view of Gnadenthal church, as it presents itself at the opening of the kloof. The rocks on both sides of the glen are of a deep brown-red colour.

28th. This was a day of peculiar happiness and comfort to many in this congregation, both to those, who were admitted to church-privileges, as above stated, and to all who took share in the prosperity of this work of God. After an animated sermon by Father Marsveld, two children were baptized. I was again, as at Groenekloof, greatly edified by the questions put to, and answers given by the parents, previous to the solemn transaction. To see the widow of poor Stephen, lately killed by the kick of a horse, now appearing with her infant at the baptismal font, was a very affecting sight, and she was particularly recommended to the prayers and kind notice of the congregation. At three in the afternoon was the baptism of nine men, and six women. All ordained ministers were engaged in this service. I baptized three, one of whom was a Caffre, Klaas Stoffel. Brother Bonatz addressed both the large audience, which filled the church, and the candidates about to be baptized, in a manner, so as to raise great attention. In the evening, we met again for the reception of three children of Christian parents into the congregation. Truly the presence of Him, who has promised to be with His people alway, even to the end of the world, was felt by most, if not all, who attended on these solemnities.

29th. I was present at the morning-meeting for Christian instruction, and afterwards, at the girls' school: one hundred and eleven children had assembled. They took leave of Father Marsveld, who had hitherto been their teacher, and received Brother Leitner in the manner before described. It was affecting to see many of them clinging about Father Marsveld, and with many tears shaking hands, to thank him for his kindness towards them, as their teacher. Some of the bigger girls seemed quite disconsolate, and cried for a long time without ceasing. About a hundred and thirty girls belong to the school.

To-day, Brother Bonatz introduced to me a Hottentot captain, who lives at Gnadenthal. He did not look much like a man in office, wore a very shabby jacket, and had neither shoes nor stockings. Brother Bonatz informed me, that he was very poor; and having brought a parcel of old clothes with me, to distribute among the poor, I presented him with a scarlet jacket, given me by a Bristol volunteer, which I happened to have among my store. I asked him to try it on, and as it fitted him well, told him that it was his, and suited him, as an English captain. He could hardly believe, that he was really put in possession of such a treasure, and strutted off with it, to the admiration of many passengers on the road, who stood in surprise at the contrast between the upper part of his attire, and the state of his legs and feet. ●

30th. Eight new-people obtained leave to live here, on trial. I spent most of the day at home.

31st. At the meeting for the children, about three hundred attended. After dinner, two Hottentots called upon me, by appointment, with whom Brother Bonatz and I wished to confer, relative to the best situation in the interior for a third missionary settlement. They proposed an examination of the banks of the Chamtoos Revier in Uitenhagen district, where they mentioned a place formerly occupied by Hottentots, and abounding with wood and water. It was also their opinion, that several suitable situations might be found on that river, and many Hottentots from Gnadenthal would be willing to remove into that part of the colony. We determined to visit some of the most intelligent farmers in the neighbouring country, and consult them about the best means of making a journey into the interior.

Being desirous of penetrating as far as possible into the kloof, the missionaries Thomsen and Lemmerz accompanied me into it, this afternoon, and as we were new-comers, we enjoyed all the pleasure expectation affords, in making a journey of discovery. We arrived at the spot, where the kloof is divided by three round-topped hillocks, which are partially covered with brush-wood. The brown-red rocks, on all sides, have a singular appearance, their layers inclining chiefly from east to west. We turned to the right along the brook, which flows under hanging rocks, shelving forwards to a considerable height, and scrambled along, through thick bushes, and over huge masses of stone, till we were stopped by the quantity of water, rushing in numberless cascades between them, in all directions. Here are some very picturesque groups of brush-wood, rock, and water, which would furnish interesting subjects for the pencil of an able artist.

In the evening, I spent a very agreeable hour with Father Marsveld, whose instructive conversation I delight to enjoy. He gave me a detailed account of the troubles which he and his two worthy associates experienced, in the beginning of their labours in this desert, till God sent the English to put a stop to the opposition of evil-disposed people. These misguided men went so far as to hand about a paper, to be signed by the neighbouring farmers, by which they should bind themselves not to supply the missionaries with the necessaries of life, which, at that early period, they could not procure otherwise than by purchase. Some refused to sign the paper, and others were raised up by God, to become their friends. He will reward them for the cup of cold water, given to His servants in that day.

I spent the 1st of Febuary chiefly at home. In the afternoon, while I was drawing by the help of the camera obscura, several Hottentots gathered round me, whom I gratified by letting one after the other peep into it. One called to another passing by, "Come and peep, Susan, Mynheer has brought the church, and all the trees, into his box."

FEBRUARY 2nd. Brother Bonatz, Brother Clemens and his wife, Sister Kohrhammer, and I, set out on a visit to some farmers, who being acquainted with the interior, could give information respecting the Chamtoos-Revier, and other situations proposed to me as suitable for a third settlement. Our equipage was a covered waggon, drawn by ten hired oxen, with a driver and leader. We passed the Bavians-Revier, and turned up the heathy hills, behind the Caffre-Kraal, towards Stoffels-Kraal. Brother Bonatz walked with me to an eminence, from which I could overlook a great part of the boundary of Gnadenthal. There is indeed, to appearance, a sufficient quantity of land, for every purpose of culture and pasturage; but of four thousand acres, granted to the Brethren by Government, the greater part is barren, and incapable of cultivation; or at least of that description, that the expense required to make it fit for use, would be much greater than we could well afford. Stoffels-Kraal is an ancient Hottentot station, but now forsaken. There is, however, some good land along a small gully, now dry. From hence we went to the farm of a widow, Mrs. Giebeler, whom we did not find at home. It is, like most farms in this neighbourhood, an assemblage of mean houses and sheds, but the plantations are fine, consisting of large peach orchards, and gardens, surrounded by avenues of firs, and of groves of various kinds of trees. This place likewise belonged to a tribe of Hottentots, but was taken from them, by a species of robbery, very common in former days, when for a few bottles of brandy, or some other trifling consideration, the best lands in their possession were purchased of them; and the Hottentot captain, perhaps in a state of intoxication, led to some magistrate, by whom the shameful bargain was ratified. The poor fellow did not come to his senses, till it was too late, when he perceived with dismay, how he had suffered himself, and his people to be duped.

Our road now led through a barren country. In about three hours we arrived at the Sicckenhaus, the residence of Mynheer Tennis senior. It was interesting to me to see and converse with this man, who, at the commencement of the mission, rendered essential services to the three Brethren, till their unexpected success in collecting a congregation of Hottentots made him, for a season, a dangerous enemy. He is however again considered as a friend, and received us with much cordiality. He seemed pleased, when I informed him, that ever since the renovation of the mission, I had been well acquainted with his name and services, when, by orders from the Dutch Governor, in 1792, he first brought the missionaries to Bavians-Kloof, and lodged them in his house, at Soete Melks Valley, till they could put up a cottage for themselves. Though upwards of seventy years old, he is full of activity, of a very intelligent mind, and seemed interested in all that passes here and in Europe.

On consulting him about the best place for a third settlement, he recommended an examination of the banks, both of the Chamtoos, and Kierbooms Reviers, and named several situations, the advantages of which he enumerated.

No trees or hedges adorn his premises, except four small oaks behind, and two Chinese rose-trees before the house. The river Sonderend flows in the vale, but its waters, in this dry season, are hid from view by large shrubs, brush-wood, broom, and reed-grass, growing in its very bed. The view of the mountains is grand, and makes amends for the melancholy appearance of the plain.

After dinner, we set out for Mr. Linde's farm, lying likewise on the Sonderend. A sudden change of weather had taken place. Clouds began first to hover above, then to obscure, the highest peaks, and gradually to envelope the whole range of mountains. We hastened therefore to get under shelter, and after a short visit to Mr. Teunis's son Jan, reached Mr. Linde's house, just before the rain came on. It lies not far from the river Sonderend, which, in most places, is hid by bushes. I had expected to find a man, formerly in the employ of Government, as a commander of Hottentots in the Caffre war, a Veldcornet, and justly esteemed as a truly respectable character throughout the country, inhabiting a well-built mansion, and I was preparing a handsome apology, for not appearing in full dress, till I saw his miserable cottage and its homely furniture. But African and English ideas, of the necessity of suiting your appearance to your rank, widely differ, and a man of consequence is here not less respected for the shabbiness of his attire, or the wretched and ruinous state of his house and premises.

Brother Bonatz was highly diverted at my disappointment, especially when, Mr. Linde not having returned from his fields, our reception seemed rather dry. As soon, however, as he entered, though clad in an old jacket and trowsers, and barefoot, the ease and urbanity of his manners, and the kindness, with which he pressed us to spend the night at his house, showed him in his true character, as a well-bred, intelligent gentleman. He had already one guest, and a farmer from the south arriving, he gave him also a friendly invitation, though the size of the cottage did not seem to furnish accommodations for so many. Some black coffee without milk, as is here the fashion, was handed round, and we soon entered into conversation respecting the aim of our visit.

Mr. Linde seemed exactly to coincide in opinion with Mr. Teunis, as to the country on the Chamtoos-Revier, but did not advise us to attempt a settlement on the Kierbooms-Revier. He was not well disposed towards the Caffres, but described them as a people without faith, to whom the British Government showed undeserved lenity.

The rain ceasing for some time, after sun-set, I walked with Brother Clemens to the river, and found the rocky banks to consist of the same ferruginous sand-stone, which abounds everywhere. Here and there, it seemed to rest on a bed of a species of slate or Thonschiefer, of a blue-grey colour.

At supper, no beverage of any kind was on the table, and our host informed us, that he never drank either beer, wine, or spirits, but only water. I therefore called for water, when the slave-girl in waiting, brought me a slop-bason full, no glass being used in this house. The supper was abundant, and well dressed. The conversation turned upon some of the beasts of prey, haunting this country, when the Southland farmer gave an account of the depredations lately committed by wolves and wild-dogs, in his neighbourhood, the latter being numerous, between the mountains and the coast. Tygers are not often seen; they skulk about the cattle-kraals, and in the woods, but wolves roam singly, all over the downy or heathy country. The wild-dogs go in packs, are very bold and mischievous, and will attack oxen, horses and sheep, in spite of watchmen and dogs. Both they and the wolves, attack always either from behind, or in flank, never in front, as a tyger does. Serpents are more dangerous to man. Mr. Linde related, that a wood-keeper he employed in the kloofs, had lately lost his life by the bite of a Berg-adder. He died before notice could reach his master, and assistance be sent, which was in about three hours. Not long since, one of his oxen was bitten, on the road, by a Puff-adder, and died the same night. The bite of the Nachtschlange, or night-serpent, is said by the Hottentot poison-doctors, to be incurable. It is a beautiful creature, marked with dark blue or black, vermilion and yellow rings, following each other from head to tail.

Some time after supper, the ladies retired, but Brother Bonatz and I received still much entertainment and information from our host and his guests, who were sensible, pleasant companions, till at length we requested to be shown into our bed-room. In passing through an anti-chamber, we found a Dutch folio bible, and a testament in octavo, lying on the window-seat. Both had been used, the latter some time ago, for it had lain so long with the leaves upon the boards, that the opened pages had assumed the colour of the wood. As for the bible, one use of long prefaces, introductory exhortations, and other prolegomena, with which these ancient editions abound, was here rendered manifest, for they had saved the text of the Scriptures itself, as some of the family had torn out the greater part, both of the first and last leaves, and had not yet reached either Genesis or the Revelations, the latter being defended by a translation of Josephus's account of the destruction of Jerusalem. Thus by a timely remonstrance, I hope the bible itself, has been saved. It was furnished with very good prints, in the old Dutch style of engraving.

On entering the bed-room, how great was my astonishment, now to discover, how our hospitable landlord had provided for so many guests! We found Brother Clemens and his wife, lying in one, Sister Kohrhammer in another, and a bedstead for us, in a third corner of the room. A square hole in the wall served for a window. A savoury supper, without any thing to drink, had created sufficient thirst, to keep our friends awake. They were eagerly expecting our arrival, as Brother Bonatz had the key of the waggon-chest, who was now called upon to administer a draught of wine and water to each of the party. Trying to open the shutter for air, it fell out, and as we could not leave the square hole open, for fear of a visit from some of the numerous dogs, which guarded the premises, I had some trouble in recovering and fastening the shutter again. These operations, and the amusement occasioned by the remarks made on the accommodations afforded in the mansion of an African 'squire, kept us some time awake, and when at last I attempted to join my friend in his narrow couch, I found it utterly impossible. I therefore put on my boots and great coat, and sitting on the bed, leaning my head against the wall, got a very sound nap. To complete our happiness, we were all night serenaded by the cries of Mrs. Linde's children, in an adjoining apartment; and roused early in the morning by the dying screams of a poor pig, which, as we were afterwards informed, was butchered, to provide us with a good breakfast. This was the first time I had spent a night in the enjoyment of African hospitality, and Brother Bonatz assured me, of what I was in the sequel sufficiently convinced, that it was much better, than I had to expect, when travelling into the interior. We were greeted by our cheerful host in the morning, with his hopes, that we had found ourselves comfortably lodged, and which we could answer in the affirmative without hypocrisy, for his goodwill, and desire to please us, made every thing bearable.

He provided us with an excellent breakfast, broiled pork, omelets, eggs, tea and coffee, with milk and grapes in abundance, and though custom has excluded attention to what Englishmen call the comforts, yet there seems to be no want of the necessities of life, and no feeling of inconvenience attending the absence of neatness, and elegance. We took leave of Mr. Linde, with sentiments of gratitude and esteem, having obtained from him sufficient information respecting the country I was about to visit, and proceeded to Gaense-Kraal, which at some distance appeared very inviting with groves of lofty oaks and pines. We forded the Sonderend close to the farm, but on entering, found the building in a very dilapidated state, and the gardens much neglected. Sister Kohrhammer was also here unsuccessful, in her endeavours to procure some articles of house-keeping, for Gnadenthal.

We admired the oaks growing on these premises. They are an additional proof, that had the first settlers been attentive to the growth of timber, both for their own and their children's sake, they would now have had timber and fuel sufficient, and not been under the necessity of fetching the former from Plettenberg-bay, and the Zitzikamma, and of stripping the country of its bushes, to procure the latter. I am convinced, from the experience made at Gnadenthal, and many other places, that whole forests of oak and other useful timber, might be reared in a short space of time, wherever the soil retains any moisture. But it appears, as if neither the first settlers nor their descendants, had the least notion of providing for posterity. Many answers given to me by boors, otherwise intelligent, proved that their only thought is, "What shall we eat? What shall we drink, and wherewith shall we be clothed? How shall we increase our herds of cattle, and leave to our children a set of fine beasts."

Mr. Teunis senior, who is one of the most sensible and shrewd men I have seen in this country, very ironically described the indolent life of the common African boors, in answer to some observations I made on the possibility of improving the cultivation of the country. "What," said he, "would you have us do? We " have nothing to do, but to fill our bellies, to get good clothes, " and houses; to say to one slave, do this, and to another, do that, " and ourselves to sit idle, and be waited on; and as to our mode " of tillage, or building, or planting, our forefathers, did so and so,

“ and were satisfied, and why should not we be the same. The “ English want us to use their ploughs, instead of our heavy wooden “ ones, and recommend other implements of husbandry than those
“ we have been used to, but we like our old things best.”

From Gaense-Kraal, we proceeded to Soete-Melks-Valley, and Hartebeest-Kraal, the farm of Mr. William Teunis. As we approached this place, the chain of mountains to the right assumed an appearance singularly romantic, and beautiful. They are chiefly huge masses of rock, extremely rugged and precipitous, full of kloofs, and chasms, within which, upon but a scanty portion of soil, trees grow, to a considerable height. The sides of the mountains, in many places, look like immense walls, supported by conical buttresses.

Mr. William Teunis is an intelligent man. He had been employed as a commandant in the wars, both against the Caffres, and the rebellious boors, but seemed cautious in giving his opinion respecting the cause of the rebellion.

An old schoolmaster, who attended his children, hearing that we were lovers of music, treated us with some pieces on the violin. We obtained here likewise some useful information, and after dinner, set out for Gnadenthal. Our driver, Paul, set his oxen agoing at a rate I had never yet seen. Ten of these long-horned animals in full gallop, is a sight truly ridiculous. About eight in the evening, we reached our home. Here we heard, that a tyger had been seen behind Brother Leitner's garden, at the entrance of the kloof, and that a great many Hottentots, armed with guns and other weapons, had gone in search of him, but in vain.

4th. After the forenoon's service, and the baptism of a child, we attended the funeral of a poor Hottentot woman. I guess the company that followed her remains to the grave, to have been about three hundred in number. The Hottentot mode of burying in our settlement is this: The corpse being neatly tied or sowed up in skins, is laid on a bier, and covered with a white sheet. The bier is borne by six men, members of the congregation, dressed in white jackets and trowsers. After the funeral-discourse, as soon as the people have arranged themselves in front of the church, a verse is sung, treating of the happiness of those, who have departed this life in the faith of Christ. The boys' school begins the procession, then follows the minister, preceding the corpse, the relations next, and lastly, the rest of the congregation two and two; the men or women taking the lead, according to the sex of the deceased. As soon as the company arrive at the burial-ground, the bier being placed next to the grave, the congregation range themselves around the ground in order. The Liturgy at burials is then read, during which, two of the bearers, descending into the grave, receive the body from those above, and place it in a recess, made on one side, at the bottom. The service being concluded, bushes or branches of trees are put in as high as the top of the recess, and the earth thrown in upon them. Of the origin of this custom I could obtain no information, but as it is done with the greatest decency, the missionaries have wisely refrained from obliging the Hottentots to discontinue the practice of making a recess, and using the branches or bushes. Europeans are buried in the manner usual in Europe, and the service and liturgy are the same. In the evening-meeting of the whole missionary family, I communicated some recent letters from our Brethren in Greenland.

5th. At a special conference, we took into serious consideration, the measures to be adopted in making a reconnoitring journey into the interior, and my proposal to take Brother Schmitt and his wife, of Groenekloof, and one of the two single Brethren Lemmerz or Stein with me, was approved. I had made some experience of Cape travelling, sufficient to discover, that it is no luxury; but I came thither to serve the mission, and not to seek my ease. I therefore gladly entered upon this service, though the only plan, which we could form at present, was, to take our own waggon and oxen, and to purchase an additional spann, in the interior, to help us along. It will be seen by the narrative of that journey, that, by God's gracious providence, we were enabled to perform it on a plan much more eligible and effective; without which, indeed, all our contrivances would have been rendered abortive. Thus committing our case and ourselves to His care and guidance, we are sure to be directed in the best way.

I resolved to go in a few days to Groenekloof, and both there, and at the Cape, to make the needful arrangements, and obtain His Excellency the Governor's permission and sanction. In the afternoon, I was busily employed in making a drawing of the missionaries' premises from the hill to the right, coming out of the kloof, having lately found a situation from which I could see some part of every building belonging to them.

In the evening, Father Marsveld, after a suitable discourse, offered up a fervent prayer for the prosperity of the work of God on earth, particularly among the heathen, the Brethren having here followed the practice of other missionary societies in England and Holland, to meet for this purpose every first Monday in the month.

6th. I attended the instructions given by Father Marsveld to a person who was to be confirmed, previous to her admission to the Lord's supper. I was greatly edified and affected by the simplicity, cordiality and genuine piety with which this venerable man imparted his instruction to the candidate, as well as with the attention and devotion with which she received it. At the conclusion, he offered up a fervent prayer in her behalf, and both he and his wife added some suitable exhortations respecting her future walk and conversation, as a worthy communicant, and child of God.

In the afternoon, Brother Lemmerz accompanied me to the hill on the other side of the Bavians-Revier, and to the garden-grounds belonging to the Hottentots. A little man, very ill dressed, beckoned to us, inviting us to come into his cottage and grounds. From his appearance, I guessed him, to be one of those, who were either too poor or too indolent to provide better for themselves and their families. I was therefore preparing to impart some friendly exhortation, when, on stepping within the outer fence, to my surprise, I saw a hedge neatly cut and trimmed, with a small gate, through which he showed us into one of the best cultivated gardens I have yet seen in the settlement. It was divided into squares, with borders of Indian corn, each square containing a different kind of produce, beans, potatoes, cabbages, or other vegetables. The orchard was well stocked with peach, apricot, pear, and apple-trees, in abundance. The cottage was mean, and his children almost naked. On inquiry, I found, that he was very poor, and had only one suit of decent clothing, with which the family appeared on the Sundays at church. His name was Benjamin Okkers.

To-day, I received a letter from Mr. Melville, Government-surveyor at the Cape. This was the commencement of an acquaintance, which in the sequel proved a most valuable acquisition, and will always be considered by me, as one of those unforeseen channels, by which God, in His providence, conveys mercies unto us, and grants success to whatever we undertake, according to His will.

7th. Two Hottentot women called upon me, purposely to inquire about the son of their late beloved teacher, Father Kuehnel, now at Fulnec in Yorkshire. I gave them every information in my power, and having a print of Fulnec with me, showed them the school, the windows of the room in which he lived, of the room in which I was born, and the chapel, which highly delighted them. I was surprised to find them not at all puzzled by a representation of this kind. They proved, that they understood the picture, by asking many sensible questions, showing more intelligence than a boor, who lately on seeing an "Ecce homo" (a picture of Christ, crowned with thorns), in Father Schwinn's room, inquired, whether it was a picture of the English Governor at the Cape.

In the evening-meeting, Brother Bonatz mentioned my intended journey to the Cape, and in prayer commended me and my company to the protection and blessing of God.

8th. At four in the morning, the whole family was at breakfast, soon after which I set out on horseback, accompanied by their best wishes for a prosperous journey. My companion was

Brother Lemmerz, and my groom, Solomon Pfeiffer, a very steady and trust-worthy Hottentot, with a led horse to carry a portman-teau. I did not feel quite well, and the missionaries, having charged Solomon to take all possible care, that I received no harm, he was almost troublesome with his anxieties about the safety of my person. Perceiving however, that I meant to ride more soberly than a Hottentot, who is always in full gallop, he observed, that unless Mynheer used more speed, we should not reach Mr. Alexander's farm, beyond Hottentot-Hollands-Kloof, where he thought I meant to spend the night. But, as the weather was intensely hot, I had no intention of murdering either myself or our horses, but kept on an easy pace.

After passing Klemms' farm, we met Brother Leitner returning with his wife from the warm-baths. We all alighted, and spent a quarter of an hour together in conversation. Our first halt was at a farm, belonging to a Mr. Joorst. The heat grew almost intolerable, and we were glad to retire into any kind of shade; not a tree or bush affording any defence, against the burning rays of the sun during the whole journey. The farm, like most others, is a mass of ruined walls, and wretched hovels. The master was a paralytic old German, painfully striving to make himself intelligible to Brother Lemmerz, and by the help of his son, as interpreter, to satisfy his eager curiosity about the politics of the day and the fate of nations, which seemed grievously to trouble the poor man's brains, and set his lame tongue to work. He had been a sailor on board a Dutch Indiaman, some fifty years ago. His son was a friendly, hospitable man, and a shoemaker by trade. Some hints, given by my worthy companion, relating to the necessity of his becoming, in his present infirm state, better acquainted with the things of Heaven, than those of the earth, were neither understood nor taken. We left him with emotions of sincere compassion.

After a very hot ride over the barren desert, we reached a farm on the Botte-Revier, where I soon recognized the possessor to be my old friend, whom Sister Clemens and I had visited on our journey to Gnadenthal. (p. 56). Hither we had sent relay-horses which were ready to carry us forward. But I was in no hurry to proceed, and had serious doubts, whether exposing myself longer to the rays of the sun were not sporting with my health, for by the time we reached this place, I felt quite overcome with heat and fatigue.

Our host, however, treated us with so excellent a dish of tea, which, as he said, had been given him by an English traveller some days ago, that it greatly revived my spirits, and a plate of fine grapes completed my recovery. Having forded the bed of the river, in which there was hardly a few inches depth of water, we reached the foot of a long hill called the Haue Hoek, where the English have established a turnpike, to cover the expense of mending the road across the mountain, which formerly was very rough and dangerous. We had resolved to take up our night's lodging at a German farmer's house, on the east-side of the mountain, of the name of Urie, who keeps a kind of inn, and has good accommodations: but when we reached his place, as it was yet early, I was disposed to proceed. The road is in general pretty even, but here and there carried along a steep slope, which makes it dangerous for a loaded waggon, if not driven with great care. The view of the mountains near Hottentots-Holland is grand, and the variety of their shapes forms a singular outline. After fording the Palmite-Revier, we rode up to a farm on the waste, the appearance of which was not in its favour, nor did we find the master and mistress at home. We therefore determined on proceeding to the next farm, belonging to a German of the name of Sibran.

He received us with a hearty welcome, and though every part of his premises betrayed poverty and a disregard of order, he gave us a good dish of coffee with milk, (a rare article in this part of Africa), and a good supper: but his accommodations for sleeping were bad. Brother Lemmerz and I were jammed into a narrow bedstead, and our Hottentot groom, contrary to the usual etiquette, lay down in the same room on the floor. The furniture of this dark chamber was in unison with general appearances. On a broken chair lay a quantity of butcher's meat, in reserve for tomorrow's dinner, when Mr. Sibran expected his wife and family to return from a journey of pleasure to Capetown. But fatigue and no choice, made us make the best of it, and we rested tolerably well. Mean-while, our good-humoured host did all in his power to amuse us, by relating the history of his whole life, and requesting Brother Lemmerz to examine one of his daughters in reading. Among his servants was an Englishman from Hull.

9th. After paying cheaply for our fare, we set out before sun-rise, to pass the kloof in the cool of the morning. The ascent from the east is rough, but not steep. The wildness of the scenery can scarcely be surpassed. Rocks of every shape, weather-beaten and worn, pointed and jagged, start on all sides, to a great height, one ridge towering above the other. They are the haunts of hosts of baboons; but some waggons having just come up, these timid creatures had probably been frightened by the cracking of whips, and fled into their lurking-places; for though the morning is the proper time for them to make their appearance, not one was to be seen.

The prospect from the summit of the kloof, over the fertile grounds of Hottentots-Holland, and towards Simons' and Table-bay, is delightful.

We continued our route, till we arrived at Mr. Dirk Cloete's charming place beyond Stellenbosch, where we dined with the family, and rested about six hours. After sun-set we proceeded, hoping to arrive at some place of shelter towards midnight, or even perhaps to reach Groenekloof between one and two in the morning, before the moon should set. The coolness of the evening refreshed both men and horses, and we travelled pleasantly till midnight, when Solomon observed, that he had lost the track, and feared we were taking a wrong direction. Fires, occasioned by the burning of the bushes on the sides of the hills, illumined the horizon for some time. The moon set, reddened by a kind of haze, which by degrees spread all over the sky, and covered the lower ranges of hills, leaving no marks, by which we might discover our way in the dark. We now reached a place where two roads met, one taking a westerly, and the other a northerly direction. Solomon walked forward on each, and returned with very evident marks of dismay in his countenance. "Well Solomon," said I, "which way are we to ride?" "Ah, Sir," replied he, "I am lost. God must help us! Mynheer must decide, and we shall be right." The roar of the sea to westward was now very distinct, and knowing, that towards that quarter we could not err, I chose the western road, on which we proceeded with our weary horses for some time, till perceiving the light of a fire, apparently at a short distance before us, we made towards it, and after much anxiety, the fire appearing and vanishing by turns, as though it fled from us, we at length arrived at it. Here we found two waggons, with two slaves sleeping on the bare ground, to whom we were announced by the barking of their dogs. We dismounted, and turned the horses loose, to seek a supper. Solomon, overjoyed at finding a resting-place, exclaimed, "Well, I knew, that the road Mynheer would chuse, must be the right one, though he has never been here before." The slaves informed us, that we were at the Diep-Revier, and in the right way to Groenekloof. Brother Lemmerz and I kept awake, and fed the fire with bushes; but Solomon, with a saddle for his pillow, lay down on the ground, and instantly fell asleep. It was now two o'clock, and we spent the following two hours in agreeable conversation; chiefly on the mercies of the Lord shown to us during our whole lives, but particularly on our late voyage and journies together; to our brethren, engaged in the service of this favoured mission, and to the Hottentot race, in sending the gospel to them. I believe His eye was upon us in this wilderness, and He filled our hearts with His love and peace.

Our situation presented a picture worthy of the pencil of the most expert artist. Two men, sitting on stones near a fire, the blaze of which illumined the surrounding heath, showing, to the right, the weary oxen belonging to the waggons, lying in different attitudes, and at various distances, and, to the left, our horses in similar positions; the two covered waggons in the back-ground, and the slaves and Solomon asleep under the bushes. After four o'clock, some cocks in the waggons announced the approaching day. Their crowing was answered by the yells of jackals on the waste, and shortly after, by the more frightful howl of a wolf, not very far off. Some large birds flew croaking over our heads, and joined the dismal concert, accompanied by other voices, unknown to us. Never did we more gladly hail the morning's dawn. We waked our sleepy groom, saddled our horses, and set off, before the sun had risen. At the farm of a friendly miller, near the Dassenberg, both we and our hungry beasts found some refreshment, and after two hours' rest, pursued our journey towards Groenekloof. Our arrival, about noon, was unexpected.

This was the hottest day known for some years at the Cape. About two in the afternoon, Fahrenheit's thermometer stood at 107° in the shade. I found Brother Schmitt and his wife, and Brother Stein well, and willing to accompany me on the reconnoitring journey into the interior, according to the plan proposed. I spent the remainder of the day in walking to different parts of the village, and visiting many of the families. Some of them are very poor, which the state of the cottages on the west side of the valley sufficiently declares. Those who, from the number of their children, or from age or sickness, are not able to help themselves, are now and then assisted by a collection made, at stated times, for the relief of the poor; but wisdom and discretion are required in the exercise of this charity, lest a dependance upon gratuitous help should occasion neglect, and prevent proper exertion on the part of the healthy.

11th. The Sunday-services were held as usual. Groenekloof lying in the neighbourhood of large farms, Sunday visitors frequently occasion interruption; the Holy Communion, therefore, is here likewise celebrated in the evening. To the missionaries, as well as to me, the state of the communicant congregation here, was truly encouraging, as a proof, that "their labour is not in vain in the Lord."

12th. Soon after four in the morning, I heard the sweet sound of Hottentot voices, singing a hymn in the hall before my chamber-door. It reminded me, that this day was my birth-day, which had been mentioned to them by some of the missionaries. I was struck and affected by this mark of their regard, nor was their mode of expressing it confined to a morning-song. They had dressed out my chair, at the common table, with branches of oak and laurel, and Sister Schmitt's school-children, in order not to be behind in their kind offices, having begged their mistress to mark on a large white muslin handkerchief, some English words, expressive of their goodwill towards me, they managed to embroider them with a species of creeper called cat's-thorn, and fastened the muslin in front of a table, covered with a white cloth, and decorated with festoons of cat's-thorn and field-flowers. On the table stood five large bouquets, in glasses. The whole arrangement did credit to their taste, for Sister Schmitt had left it entirely to their own invention. This table I found placed in my room on returning from my morning's walk. The words were; "May success crown every action."

Recapitulating, within my own heart, the undeserved mercies of God my Saviour, experienced during the year past, I felt particularly grateful for the favour conferred upon me, to behold with my own eyes, and hear with my own ears, what He has wrought in this distant land for the accomplishment of His thoughts of peace towards the Gentile world. To serve such a cause, shall, by His enabling grace, be my heart's delight, during the remainder of my earthly pilgrimage.

The excessive heat of the last days, which we had felt so oppressively on our journey hither, seemed to have brought into action all the electricity contained in the atmosphere, and already, early in the forenoon, very dense, black, towering clouds were seen covering the mountains near Stellenbosch. It thundered almost incessantly in that quarter for several hours before the storm rose towards us. We were at dinner, when the increasing darkness announced its approach, and it began to rain violently. I scarcely ever remember to have seen lightning so vivid, and heard peals of thunder so loud, with a crackling and roaring not to be described. In a short time, every part of the premises was inundated. The streams flowed in all directions, and some hundreds of a species of frogs, or toads, came clumsily hopping from the wood, and passed in procession with the stream across the yard to the pond in the valley. For above an hour and a half, there was no intermission in the fury of the tempest, after which the thunder roared incessantly round the horizon for three hour's more. In the evening, all was calm, the air cool and refreshing, the moon shone bright, and after the family had retired to rest, I walked by moon-light, for half an hour, on the raised terrace before the house, engaged in recollections, grateful and humiliating, and closed my birth-day with prayer and praise to God for all his goodness to myself, my family, friends, and connexions. I should not have noticed the celebration of this day, had it not served to exhibit some traits in the character of the Hottentots, whose sincerity, gratitude, and attachment to their teachers and benefactors, and their manner of expressing these sentiments made a deep impression on my mind, and are more deserving of record, than the day itself.

13th. Having been employed all day in various correspondence, Brother Schmitt and his wife agreed to accompany me to Capetown, in a waggon and twelve oxen, leaving Brother Lemmerz and Solomon to follow us in a few days.

We left Groenekloof at seven in the evening, with fine moon-light, but in about an hour, a fog and cold, drizzling rain came on, which made us glad to take shelter in a cottage, consisting of two roofs without subjacent walls. It is built in two divisions standing in a right angle, and kept by a very civil couple, whose furniture showed their love of cleanliness and order. The weather cleared up, before we arrived at Capetown.

14th. We were received by Mrs. Disandt and her family with their wonted kindness, and spent the day in visiting friends. I was introduced to Mr. Hammes, who accompanied the Rev. Mr. Campbell on his late tour to visit the settlements of the Missionary Society in London.

15th. I called this morning upon Mr. Melville, Surveyor to Government, of whose friendly letter to me I made mention on the 6th. His house is situated towards the foot of the Duivelsberg, or Devil's hill. On communicating to him my intention of making a journey into the interior, he expressed an inclination to accompany me, at least part of the way, which, though uncertain how it might accord with our plans, I immediately felt disposed to encourage, and before I left Capetown, my companions most gladly concurring in the measure, we made an arrangement, by which Mr. Melville and his family were to follow us in a fortnight to Gnadenthal, and leaving Mrs. Melville and the children there, give us the pleasure of his company, as long as his other engagements would permit. I then waited on Colonel Bird, and had a long and satisfactory conversation with him, respecting the affairs of Groenekloof and the above-mentioned journey. He kindly furnished me with a list of all the loan places belonging to Government, situated on the Chamtoos and Klein Reviers. Mr. Alexander coming in, insisted on my accompanying him to his seat at Kerstenbosch; and hoping that I might find there a favourable opportunity of conversing with him, as First Colonial Secretary, on some business, which I felt anxious to have completed, I agreed and went with him. Passing Newlands, we met Mr. Bentinck, whom Mr. Alexander prevailed upon to return and dine with us. The presence of this very agreeable gentleman prevented the conversation I had proposed to myself.

As wolves every now and then descend from the mountains behind the house, and pass through the premises, and the moon shone bright, I stood long at the window, in vain watching for them. My curiosity was punished with a severe cold.

16th. In the morning I felt unwell, but walked before breakfast with Mr. Alexander into his woods, up the mountain. They consist of oak, chesnut, and witte-boom. We were engaged in a discussion on affairs of our establishments in this country. After breakfast, I went with him and his lady to town, where I found an invitation from the Governor to come and spend a few days with him at Newlands. My good friend, Mr. Hancke, accompanied me, but I was far from well, and could not much enjoy the kindness and hospitality I experienced. Some medicine, however, relieved me.

17th. I rose, considerably recovered, and walked before breakfast into the gardens, which are laid out in the Dutch style, with long avenues, covered walks, and square compartments surrounded with high trees, enclosing orchards and kitchen-gardens. The principal walks are made with a vermillion-coloured iron-stone, beat into gravel, or brought in that state from the mountains. Near the houses, are groves of oaks, planted in quincunx, and a labyrinth of shady paths intersecting each other. The house is large, with good rooms, and fitted up in the English taste. Looking towards it from the garden, Table-Mountain and the Devil's hill form a noble back-ground, being also here much more picturesque in their form, than on the town-side. After breakfast, Captain Cloete, the Governor's Aid-de-camp, walked with me all over the grounds. His Excellency asked me to ride with him, but feeling yet somewhat feverish, I was obliged to decline it. When left alone, I took another gentle stroll into the wild wood under the Table-Mountain, and examined, or I should rather say, admired, some curious trees and plants, knowing nothing of the names of either genus or species. The witte-boom is used for fuel, being unfit for building, furniture, or implēments of husbandry.

Mean-while signals, made at the signal-house on the Devil's hill, and shortly after a dispatch, announced the arrival of a Dutch ship of war, with the Governor of Batavia, Bar^{on} de Capelle, on board. The Governor was therefore again obliged to postpone his intended journey to Groote-Post, near Groenekloof, and my visit to Newlands was likewise shortened. I employed my time in writing several letters to England.

18th. His Excellency having suffered me to claim his attention to some business this morning, I had the satisfaction of much private conversation with him, both before and during breakfast, and experienced every mark of goodwill in his approbation of the subjects I laid before him, both relating to the building of a new church at Groenekloof, the possession of land belonging to our settlements, the objects of my intended expedition, and the gift of such unoccupied land, as I might find suitable for a third settlement. He promised, that letters should be directed to the landdrosts of Zwellendam, George, and Uitenhagen, to afford me every facility in my search, which, in the sequel, proved of the most essential service to me. On this occasion, I became better than ever acquainted with his Excellency's favourable disposition towards the Missions of our Church, as they contribute to further the propagation of Christianity, and to introduce industry and civilization among a nation, hitherto considered as the most abject and degraded part of the human race, but whose improvement and welfare he seemed eager to promote; and I could ever after feel full confidence in proposing to him any plan, having these benefits for its object.

As he went to town to meet the Dutch Governor, he proposed to send word, whether he should stay or return, and kindly detained me. My time was well spent in writing and completing my journal and memorandums, till his return.

19th. The Governor, attended by his son and two dragoons, went to town. Captain Cloete with myself followed in his coach. Brother Lemmerz having arrived in town from Groenekloof, we resolved to set out on our return to Gnadenthal in the afternoon. It turned out a windy evening. After about two hours' ride through the sands, or Cape Downs, we hoped to find shelter with a farmer; but as he had no stable for our horses, we proceeded, and after two hours more, reached a small farm, near the Erste Revier, where, after battering for some time at doors and windows, we found no entrance. Total silence announced the family fled. We forded the river, and called at another larger farm, where we were assailed by ten or twelve fierce dogs, and heard the woman of the house bid her slave tell us, that, her husband being absent at Stellenbosch, she could not give us quarters, in which, however, she was contradicted by her more honest servant. It was midnight, and our horses as well as ourselves were not much disposed to proceed. But there was no remedy. Providentially the night was fair, and the moon shone bright. At one, we reached a good-looking house, from which we were again sent to get accommodations at a Veldcoronet's. We crept on, and on our arrival, a slave-girl opening the door, told us, that her master and mistress were gone out, and had left her alone in the house; then banged the door in our faces. What could we do, but keep on our way. At two, we reached Mr. Morkel's farm at Hottentot's-Holland. Here a slave took pity on us and our beasts, provided the latter and our groom with good quarters and food, and showed us into an empty room, with a plate of peaches on the table. In an adjoining chamber stood two empty bed-steads, on one of which, with my portmanteau for my pillow, I enjoyed some refreshing sleep for about three hours. My companion slept in a chair.

20th. On rising, the family received us kindly, lamented their not having been aware of our arrival, and treated us with a good breakfast. About seven o'clock, we reached Hottentot-Holland's Kloof, where Mr. Schultz, late of Gnadenthal, overtook and kept us company all day. We made halt for a few hours at Veldcoronet Schwartz's house, and passing to the left of the great Haue Hoek, over a wretched-looking wilderness, descended to the Botte Revier. The many fires kindled on the mountains, by the burning of bushes, gave the country the appearance of a manufacturing district in England, and our imagination conjured up furnaces, coke-burnings, and stacks of iron-works, in the midst of this uninhabitable waste. By Mr. Schultz's good guidance, we forded the river safely, and found our way along the valley to Mr. Leroux's farm, where we were well received and entertained by him and his numerous family.

21st. We set out before sunrise, and hastened towards Gnadenthal. Mr. Schultz accompanied us across the hills, as far as the vale of the Sonderend, when he turned to the right. In the vale are some delightful prospects, and the mountains about the Yagersbosch are singularly grand and picturesque. We entered Gnadenthal from the west, by Robyntjes Kraal, a farm within the boundary of the Brethren's land, and, descending from the hill, were charmed with the view of the village, the great mountain rising majestically beyond it. When the Hottentots perceived us, they came out of their cottages and gardens to the road-side to bid us welcome, and we soon found ourselves again in the midst of our friends and Brethren.

To my great satisfaction, one of the first objects that presented itself in riding into the missionaries' premises, was the foundation of the new house, laid in the best manner, and a number of Hottentot workmen diligently employed.

We now began seriously to make preparations for the reconnoitring journey, and Brother Bonatz had, during our absence, engaged oxen and drivers. In the afternoon I walked out, determined not to yield to drowsiness, and lose any part of the short time I am favoured to remain at Gnadenthal. After all I have seen of situations in this country, I have found none to be compared to Gnadenthal for snugness, cleanliness and comfort: and I often felt disposed to wish that I were young, and my lot cast in this place, that, with full vigour of mind and body, I might assist in this work.

22d. Brother Thomsen accompanied me to the nursery of young trees of various kinds, chiefly kierbooms, oaks, and firs, situated beyond the burial-ground. They seem at present to be in a thriving state, and if any dependance could be placed upon the growth of wood in this soil, provision is here made for timber and fuel for future generations. Brother Leitner then showed me the foundation of a school-room, which I had previously directed to be added to the new house, destined for the use of his wife, who, like her countrywoman, Sister Schmitt of Groenekloof, has instructed a number of Hottentot girls in working satin-stich, which they do with great neatness. Thunder-storms and heavy rains prevented our meeting at the church this evening, but we held a conference, relating to various outward concerns of the settlement, concluding with the usual evening-worship. The weather grew very boisterous towards night, with lightning, thunder, rain, and hail.

23d. I was busily engaged all day, and among other employments, undertook to assist Brother Bonatz in making grave-stones for two of his children, who died on one day, of the hooping cough. How distressing this bereavement proved to the parents, no pen can describe, but they sought and found comfort in resignation to the will of God. Were it but for these effects of true religion, how eagerly ought men to seek to become possessed of it. A heart truly devoted to, and relying upon, a gracious heavenly Father, can never become a prey to despair.

Having been charged fifty-eight rix-dollars for a grave-stone from the Cape, Brother Bonatz, anxious to save that expense to the Mission, procured two squares of good sand-stone, and was endeavouring to do the work himself. As I had, when a boy, sometimes watched a mason near our school, cutting in stone, I was able to assist, and in due time, though but dilettanti in the art, we produced well-executed inscriptions, and placed the stones on the graves, to the great admiration of the Hottentots, with whom ability to work with the hands is far more highly esteemed, than any learning and labour of the mind. In the evening, two pair were betrothed. When a Hottentot wishes to marry, he mentions his intention to the missionaries, with the name of the person he has chosen. A time being fixed for the purpose, they promise each other marriage, in presence of all the missionaries, and receive suitable exhortations respecting their conduct, the precepts given in the word of God concerning the married state, being explained to them. They are then recommended publicly to the prayers of the congregation, and shortly after, married at the church, in a public meeting.

To-day a child was drowned in the Bavian's-Revier. Means were used for its recovery, but in vain.

24th. After breakfast, I visited some Hottentots' gardens, which were kept in good order, and also walked with Brother Leitner, to see the Hottentots making unburnt bricks. The clay of this country hardens to such a degree, that a brick made of it, and well dried in the sun, is more difficult to break, than many a stone. In the afternoon was the funeral of the poor drowned child, Brother Leitner delivered a very suitable discourse to the children, on the uncertainty of life.

When it had grown too dark to write, I sat down to play something on the piano-forte. Hearing a rustling behind me, I perceived, that three or four Hottentot girls had quietly entered the room, to listen to the music. I told them, that I would play for them, but they should sing for me, as I wished to ascertain, whether, by the help of an instrument, they would keep true to the tune, without sinking their voices. They then gave out, and sung some verses, in different tunes; I always found them true to the pitch of the instrument, though every now and then I let them sing some lines by themselves, then falling in with the piano-forte, found they had not in the smallest degree lowered their voices. The number of singers gradually increased to thirty. I was pleased with this new proof of the naturally musical qualities of this nation, and was convinced, that the sinking of the voices at church, is only owing to bad precentors, but would be prevented by an organ.

After our evening-worship, the spirit of singing seemed to come upon us, and we were above an hour engaged in playing and singing verses to a variety of beautiful German hymn-tunes, some of which were new to me.

To-day, a tree-serpent haunting a tree near the garden gate, was announced by the fiscal-bird. The bird did not cease calling and screaming, till the venomous reptile was discovered and killed. Two serpents of the same kind, were shot in the garden.

25th. About two hundred persons attended the funeral of a worthy member of the congregation, who departed this life, having giving full evidence of her faith in Jesus, and her hope of a blessed immortality.

In the afternoon, a deputation of Hottentots came to request a conversation with us, about the appointment of a captain of the Hesqua tribe, intimating, that there was too much work here for only one captain of the Koopman's tribe. After proposing the subject, Brother Bonatz represented to them, that the captain, regularly appointed by Government, with two resident captains, and a corporal to assist him, could surely manage the concerns of this village; but that it appeared to him, as if, according to the fashion of the heathen, they wanted now to distinguish their particular clans, by having a captain for each, which had, in their heathen state, produced nothing but quarrels. Those who now addressed us, were all of the Hesqua tribe. Being appealed, and desired to give my opinion of this extraordinary business, I did it to the following effect:

“ When I arrived among you, I expected to find here a family of God, who considered it their highest privilege to live together in true brotherly love and harmony, as One in Jesus, delivered and redeemed from the traditions received by the vain conversation of your forefathers, who were heathen, and knew not God and His word, but were left to themselves.

“ Your divisions into separate clans, attached to particular chiefs and captains, has produced, and would again produce envy, jealousy, quarrels, and feuds, very unbecoming Christian people. Whenever the Hottentots of Gnadenthal are spoken of by the members of Government, I rejoice to hear them praised for the quietude and good order prevailing among them, which make the usual precautions taken to preserve good order, by “ multiplying magistrates and other officers, unnecessary in this “ place. You say yourselves, that the captain’s business is not “ in the village, but out of it, in securing deserters, assisting “ in the regulation of taxes, &c. and in other general affairs of “ the country. For that, he has a salary and leisure, and with “ the before-mentioned assistants, may easily accomplish his task.

“ Do you wish to be like the heathen, who glory in some fa“ vourite chief? Then let me tell you, from the history of the “ Jews, once the only chosen people of God, how it went with them “ when, from the same motive, they demanded a king.” I then told them the story, and Father Marsveld added, “ Yes, and you will “ remember, that when Samuel complained of their conduct to the “ Lord,” His answer was, “ they have not rejected Thee, but Me,” I proceeded: “ Consider, therefore, well, what you are doing, and “ whether pride and vanity are not at the bottom of this pretence “ of caring for the better regulation of the place. If so, pray God “ to deliver you from so baneful an influence. Remember also, that “ this land would not be your dwelling-place, as in former times, but “ for your teachers. It is given to them for your use, and under “ their superintendency and controul, for they may dismiss any “ one, who transgresses the rules of a Christian society. But the Bre“ thren and your teachers, are the well-wishers of all Hottentots “ without exception. Their aim is, to collect here a living congrega“ tion of true believers, who shall walk worthy of a heavenly voca“ tion and rejoice in Him, who is the only Captain of our Salva“ tion, under whose banner we are all collected as one body, to “ whatever tribe or nation we belong. The Brethren never thought, “ nor ever can admit of clans; and the English Government, which “ has spared you in many ways, on account of your orderly and
“ and Christian conduct hitherto, will take for granted, that your “ demanding more captains proves your degeneracy, and requires “ other measures to be adopted. The English will hear your pro“ posals with great disapprobation and surprise. Recollect your“ selves, therefore, and be satisfied with present arrangements.”

Several Hottentots then spoke in explanation, but Father Marsveld proved to them, that the Koopman family were duly entitled to the captaincy of this place, and not the Hesqua. They seemed to receive the exhortations and even severe reproofs, given by Brother Bonatz, with patience and kindness, and several thanked us afterwards for the pains we had taken to make the matter clear to them, promising to desist from their silly projects, to which they had been urged by a designing and crafty Hottentot in the village.

26th. Brother Bonatz proposed to show me the western boundary of the land belonging to the settlement. We set out in a bullock waggon, passed through Robyntjes Kraal, and saw a piece of land, lately exchanged and given to us by Government; after which, mounting a poney, I rode with Brother Leitner up the hill towards the Jagersbosch, to see the boundary-stones, or baakens. One of them stands in a romantic little glen, in which, as well as in a gulley on the opposite mountain, there were some beautiful water-falls. From hence the boundary-line passes across the vale of the Sonderend, to the heathy and rocky hills towards the south, then takes an eastern direction along their summits, for about two English miles. The Hottentot captain Koopman and his corporal were with us in order to become acquainted with the boundary. After the evening-service in the church, I generally spent an hour with one or other of the missionaries in their own rooms, in pleasant and useful conversation. On these occasions, Father Marsveld always gave some interesting accounts of the origin of this settlement, when he and his two fellow-labourers, Schwinn and Kuehnelt, suffered many privations, and likewise much persecution, but most cheerfully and harmoniously went to work from day to day, each taking some particular part of the labour, as settled among themselves in friendly conversation, by which, in a short time, their cottage got built and furnished, their garden dug and planted, fences and ditches made, and that with very little assistance from the Hottentots. But the "joy of the Lord was their strength," and they "served Him with gladness."

27th. I spent very busily at my desk.

28th. In the afternoon Sister Schwinn proposed showing us a curious water-fall in the western division of Bavians-Kloof, and we made a party to follow her. We scrambled up a very steep and rough road, to gain the object of our search, fighting our way through bushes and bogs, till one after the other gave it up; and when our leader arrived at the spot, she had only one man and one woman of the party, to witness her disappointment, in hardly finding a few drops trickling down the rock. However, the scramble afforded much amusement, and we found some refreshment provided among the bushes on the bank of the Bavians-Revier, where it passes under the hanging rock. I made two sketches of the singular rocks, in both divisions of the glen.

29th. Mr. Bartlett, a missionary from the Missionary Society in London, arrived here, wishing to engage Hottentot drivers and leaders to accompany him into the Namaqua country; but though encouraged by us, and even by an address of Father Marsveld to our people, in which he represented, that in assisting this missionary to proceed to his station among their countrymen, in the north-west part of the colony, they would be serving the cause of God, they very civilly declined it, on account of their engagements with the farmers, and the very long absence from their families, which the journey would require. We therefore recommended to Mr. Bartlett, to endeavour to procure assistance from Groenekloof, in which he succeeded.

March 1st. Brother Schmitt and his wife, and Brother Stein, arrived here from Groenekloof. I walked with Mr. Bartlett through the settlement, and visited some of the gardens. He was much pleased with that of Benjamin Okkers. We found the Caffre, Wilhelmina, sitting in her hut, reading a Dutch translation of the exposition of Christian doctrine. After breakfast, I was called out, to see a baboon on the hill to the right of the kloof. This was the first of these creatures I had seen here in a wild state, and a very large animal. He had approached near the gardens, with a view to steal peaches; but perceiving so many people standing to observe him, walked backwards and forwards, apparently not intimidated, now and then sitting down on a stone or large ant-hill, and surveying us. Solomon fired at him, when he retreated a few paces, but returned, and amused us for some time longer. I was glad that a second attempt to kill him did not succeed, but, on the day after, hunger bringing him into the great garden, he was hunted down by dogs, and shot.

3d. Brother Bonatz preached his farewell sermon, intending to set out for Groenekloof to-morrow in the same waggon that had brought Brother Schmitt. The congregation was much affected, and yet more in the afternoon, when Father Marsveld addressed them on the services rendered to this Mission by Brother Bonatz, and commended him and his family in prayer to the grace and protection of our Saviour. Many were the tears shed by old and young. At the close of the service, they thanked Brother Bonatz and his wife aloud for their faithful labours in this place, and afterwards came in parties to take leave. In the afternoon, we met in conference, when several subjects were discussed relating both to Brother Bonatz's return to Groenekloof, and our journey into the interior. In the evening, several of us went as far as the river Sonderend, to meet Mr. and Mrs. Melville and their children. We found them near the ford, and accompanied them to the settlement, where they met with a most cordial reception from the whole family.

4th. This morning, I was witness to that submissive attention to the directions of the missionaries, which distinguishes the Christian Hottentots, and always pleased me much. Yesterday, as we were accompanying Mr. Melville through the village, we heard in one of the cottages near the road, a great cry of some child, seemingly under the lashes of an unmerciful disciplinarian. Brother Schmitt went to see what was the matter, and to put a stop to any violence. When he entered the cottage, he found a mother lashing her daughter with a thong. She seemed in a great passion, hardly knowing what she did. He stopt her, and ordered her to come in the morning, and show cause, why she had beaten the child. This morning, she came into my room, bringing her daughter with her, and made me understand, that she was the person summoned. I called Brother Schmitt, and by her very modest and intelligible account of the girl's behaviour, it was clear, that the latter well deserved the chastisement. We spoke, however, to the mother about the passionate manner in which she administered her correction. That she acknowledged, but said, that it was occasioned by the girl's biting and kicking, and seeking to hurt her. The girl confessed all the mother had said to be true. Brother Schmitt then, in a fatherly manner, gave her due admonitions, and exhorted her to ask her mother's pardon in our presence, and to thank her for having punished her for her wicked conduct. This she immediately did, with many tears. The child being dismissed, the missionary added some words of advice to the mother respecting the treatment of her children, which she very humbly received, and of her own accord, begged his pardon for not having immediately on his entering her cottage, left off beating the child, and in her hurry, asking, who he was, as if she meant to treat him with disrespect, which had never been her intention. She is known as a woman of very good character and understanding.

It was affecting to see, with what grief the Hottentots parted with Brother Bonatz, his wife, and children, and to hear their warm expressions of gratitude for their labours of love in this congregation. After dinner, the waggon being ready, and the family seated, about two hundred Hottentots, old and young, assembled under the grove, sung a farewell-hymn, and once more expressed their best wishes for them, that the Lord would bless and reward them. Above a hundred accompanied the waggon beyond the river Sonderend.

When they were gone, we began to prepare for our journey in good earnest, and I finished my many letters, written to Europe and the Cape, with which I was likewise busily engaged on the 5th, during the whole of the forenoon, though continually interrupted by parties of Hottentots, who came to take leave, and to wish me success. They did it with such simplicity and sincerity, that, busy as I was, I could not but particularly attend to every one of them. Two women came, each carrying a roll of matting, and begged, that I would use them on the journey, for their sakes, as they had made them on purpose for me. I thanked them for this proof of their affection, informed them, that we were well provided with this useful article, but that I would accept of their kind present, and save it, to take with me on my return to England, where I would keep it and show it to my Brethren, as a token of their gratitude, for having sent them teachers.

The poor people were almost in ecstasy at the thought, that the work of their hands should go across the great waters to their teachers' land; nor did I suffer such kindness to go unrewarded.

CHAPTER VI.

Departure from Gnadenthal. Account of the company. Manner of travelling in South Africa. Arrive at Mr. Von Helsland's farm on Bock Revier. Rencontre with an enraged boor. Instance of injustice. Hot Outspann. Arrival at Zwellendam. The landdrost's hospitality. Relays. Visit to Zuurbrack. Groot-Vader's-Bosch. Duyvenhoeck's Revier. Mr. Piet du Preez.

MARCH 5th. Every previous arrangement having been made, as stated in the foregoing chapter, it was our intention to set off at twelve o'clock, with a view, before sunset, to reach the house of Mr. Von Helsland, on Bock Revier, a gentleman well known to Mr. Melville, where we might find a hospitable reception and good quarters for the first night. But by continual interruption, occasioned by parties of Hottentots, who came to take leave, and to express their good wishes and prayers, that success might attend us on our way, our departure was delayed till two o'clock. Mean-while, a large company had assembled under the grove, who joined in singing hymns, while we entered our waggons. Our company consisted of the following persons:

C. I. Latrobe, John Melville, John Henry Schmitt and his wife, and John Jürgen Stein: with the Hottentots, Marcus Moses, Christian Hector, Jeremias Waly, Lebrecht Aris, Johannes Paerl, and his father, Leonhard Paerl. The latter had lately been re-admitted, having returned to Gnadenthal after long absence. Like many other Hottentots, he had ever been extremely fond of roving, and could not well endure to remain long in one place. Several years ago, hearing on his tramps some account of Gnadenthal, and that there the Hottentots were instructed in the word of God, curiosity led him to visit that settlement. He heard the gospel with attention, and it pleased God to awaken his heart and show him the necessity of conversion. At his request, he obtained leave to live there, and as he conducted himself soberly, there was no intention on the part of the Missionaries to send him away; but he could not long bear to be confined, in attending to a field and garden. After many shorter wanderings, he absented himself for three whole years, and, during that time, had traversed the whole colony from east to west, visiting all places of which he obtained any information; till at length, weary of a vagabond life, he returned to Gnadenthal, and having anew obtained permission to reside, began seriously to make the concerns of his immortal soul his chief object.

On account of his general knowledge of every part of the colony, and especially of the district of Uitenhagen, and the Chamtoos Revier, the Brethren recommended him to me as a guide, though his age rendered him unfit to bear any great hardships. Johannes, his son, had been lately baptized, and possessed not only cleverness in the management of our teams, but a willing and cheerful spirit. The same may be said of Marcus Moses, of whose good sense and steady conduct, we had many satisfactory proofs. All of them, indeed, deserve commendation, as well for their readiness to enter into our views, and to obey all our directions without murmuring, as for their uniformly good behaviour, by which they honoured the cause of the gospel, being everywhere known and observed, as samples of Christian Hottentots.

The commission I had received, to make search after a spot of unoccupied land, for a third missionary settlement of the United Brethren, made it adviseable for me to take with me a man, who understood well the nature of the soil, and, from his knowledge of the habits of the Hottentots, and their mode of procuring subsistence, could judge better than I was able to do, of the fitness of any place we might discover. Such a man was my faithful companion, Brother Schnitt.

Mr. Melville, having brought his own travelling-waggon from Capetown, and the Gnadenthal waggon, originally destined for the journey, as before mentioned, proving too small and inconvenient, we put the baggage into the latter, and gave charge of it to Brother Stein, who willingly accepted of that honourable post, and took his seat in the baggage-waggon. The rest of us occupied the seats in the lighter vehicle.

It may not be improper, in this place, to give a more detailed account of the mode of travelling in South Africa, especially as some of my readers may be surprised to hear, that so many arrangements were required, to undertake the proposed reconnoitring journey. In England, indeed, or even on the continent of Europe, most of them would have been superfluous, as travellers find everywhere inns, provisions, and other necessaries. But it is far otherwise in this country. Here are no inns, and in those farm-houses, in which a traveller may sometimes, but not always, find quarters for the night, provisions are often scarce, and stores not to be purchased. In some, not even a room can be had for the party to sleep in, much less beds and other conveniencies. Every thing necessary for the expedition, must therefore be provided, calculating upon the time required for it. Thus, if more be in company, and the journey long, a baggage-waggon is essentially wanted. There are no post-houses, where horses may be hired. Travellers must therefore have their own horses, or oxen. The latter are by far the most useful animals for travelling in this country, for no expense attends the feeding of them, as they pick their own provender in the wilderness, where they either find grass, or eat the tender sprout of the rhinoceros, and other bushes, generally refusing hay or corn, if even set before them : whereas, if horses or mules are employed, a sufficient stock of the latter must be provided.

Many travellers sleep in their waggons, but we found it more comfortable, to put up a tent. Cooking utensils are likewise necessary, as all victuals must be dressed in the fields, unless it happens, that a dinner or supper may be had at a farm-house, where the people are able and willing to entertain and lodge strangers. The roads being in many places excessively bad, stony, and steep, more cattle are wanted than on roads regularly made and kept in repair. There are even places, where more than twenty oxen must be employed to drag the waggons up the precipitous ascent, and where horses would scarcely be of use. From this account it is plain, that arrangements, very different from what are required in Europe, are necessary for a journey in South Africa.

A team or set of oxen or horses put to a waggon, is called by the Dutch a Spann, and those places in the wilderness, where halt is made and the oxen unyoked, an Outspann-place. As this is a convenient word for the purpose, I am glad to be authorized by the journals of other English travellers, to retain it. The oxen are left, from two to four hours, to seek their food and get rest, while the travelling party cook their victuals and take their meals.

Since farms have multiplied, the situation and boundaries of out-spann-places, have been appointed by Government, generally near some river or spring, as the want of water injures the oxen more than the want of provender. A loaded waggon requires from twelve to sixteen oxen, and a light travelling waggon, from eight to twelve. Besides the Hottentot driver, who, sitting on the box, directs the whole span, without reins, merely by means of his long whip, there is always a man, or sometimes only a little boy employed, as a leader. (See p. 39). The heathen Hottentots have no mercy upon their draught oxen, and the skin of most of them, is cut in all directions by their whips, so as to present to the eye the resemblance of net-work. They drive and ride their horses and mules, with equal want of feeling, and it is well for them, that the Cape horses are a very hardy race. Nor is it without much teaching, even after they have become Christians, that they are convinced of the impropriety of such usage of dumb animals, and learn that Christian lesson "Be ye merciful, as your Heavenly Father also is merciful," Luke, vi. 36. "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast, but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel," Prov. xii. 10. We took three saddle-horses with us, to be used, as occasion might require, in examining the country.

Thus equipped, we proceeded with tolerable speed. About one hundred and fifty Hottentots, who accompanied us out of Gnaden-thal across the hills, left us in parties, repeating their farewell benedictions. Mrs. Melville and her family went with us as far as Mr. Von Helsland's farm, on Bock Revier, which we had hoped to reach in six hours, but we were full ten hours on the road. The moon had set, before we arrived, but, late as it was, we found the family prepared to receive us in the most hospitable manner.

6th. About sun-rise, the whole company assembled, with our worthy host, under the shade of some oaks, before the door. The morning-haze proclaimed a hot day, and we determined to stay here, till towards evening, when generally a cool breeze springs up, and the moon favoured our proceeding during the night.

Mr. Von Helsland's estate is well cultivated, and has abundance of wood and water. Timber is found in the kloofs or narrow glens, intersecting the high range of mountains, which here have a very rugged and romantic appearance.

After walking with our host through his garden-grounds and vineyards, I spent some time in endeavouring to make an accurate sketch of the outline of the whole chain, as seen from a field above the farm, but found the sun's heat almost intolerable. To exhibit, by a drawing, the characteristic features of a country, it is of most consequence, that the shape of its hills should be delineated with the strictest accuracy, and the features of the African ranges are too singular, not to attract attention. The few sketches I have inserted in this work, may, I trust, be pronounced scrupulously exact, as to outline, which is all the merit to which I lay any claim.

While we were at dinner, the infant daughter of a relation of the family, who had been long ailing, unexpectedly died in the nurse's arms. This event threw the ladies into great agitation, nor did Mr. Von Helsing's kind and consoling exhortations to resignation seem to have much effect. They all retired to their own rooms, and we were very sorry, not to be able to express our gratitude, both for the kindness and hospitality, with which we had been entertained, and for a considerable present of grapes, apples, dried peas and beans, fowls, tongues, and other provisions, which, by Mr. Von Helsing's orders, had been conveyed into the waggons, for our use.

Mr. Von Helsing is a native of Flanders. Having spent the early part of his life at college, and travelled into various parts of Europe, he made several voyages to the East Indies and the Cape, as Captain of a Danish East-India-man, and, after a life of great activity and usefulness, settled in this country. He is a man of the most polished manners, speaks English fluently, and can converse in German, Danish, and Latin, with ease. The family spend the summer on his farm, but in winter reside at Capetown.

About five o'clock in the afternoon, we took leave of our kind host, and leaving Mrs. Melville and her children to spend some time with the family, previous to her taking up her abode at Gnadenenthal, during Mr. Melville's absence, we left Bock Revier, forded the river Sonderend, and travelled, with a bright moon to light us on a good road, till ten at night, when, for the first time, we pitched oument on the waste, cooked our supper, and having commended ourselves to the protection of God, slept well on our mattresses, till half past five in the morning.

7th. We had not proceeded far, before we were stopped by a boor on horseback. He came on full speed, jumped off his horse close to our waggon, shook hands with each of the party, and observed, that we had a Hottentot with us, Lebrecht Aris, who was bound by a regular contract made with him, to come and work at his farm, immediately after New-year, but had not made his appearance. Brother Schmitt ordered Lebrecht to come forward. The boor no sooner saw him, than his whole countenance changed from affected friendliness, to that of an infuriated demon. He began to rave at the poor Hottentot, without permitting him to utter a word in his own defence. Never in my life have I heard Dutch spoken with such fluency. As his rage increased with every sentence, the guttural sounds of that elegant language, seemed to proceed deeper and deeper from the bottom of his throat. At length, almost breathless with exertion, he turned to Brother Schmitt, and demanded, whether he would give up the man. On being answered in the negative, he mounted his horse, and galloped off to the Veldcoronet's house, which lay in sight and near the road. We followed quietly, and Brother Schmitt going up to the door with Lebrecht, the Veldcoronet, on examination, being doubtful as to the validity of the contract, thought proper to suffer the Hottentot to accompany us, but promised the boor, that after our return, he might claim his services. Poor Lebrecht stood dumbfounded, nor would the boor suffer him to speak. It was to us a very unpleasant adventure, not only because it occasioned delay, but as the character of our Hottentots was implicated.

This instance, however, was one among many, which shows the injustice sometimes done to these poor people, if left without protection to the mercy of the boors; and here it may be proper to anticipate, by giving an explanation of the business, as it appeared, on examination, before the landdrost of Zwellendam, on our return.

Lebrecht Aris owed twelve dollars to a farmer, in the neighbourhood of Gnadenthal, and not having the means to pay, engaged with the boor above-mentioned to work six months on his farm, at two dollars per month and his cost, on condition, that the boor should immediately discharge his debt. . He had worked two months, when his creditor again called on him, and threatened him with imprisonment, unless he immediately paid the twelve dollars. In his distress, he applied to a missionary, who lent him the money, for the payment of which he received a regular receipt from his creditor. This receipt the poor man had in his pocket, but being nearly frightened out of his senses, by the violence of the boor's behaviour, he forgot to produce it at the Veldcoronet's. After discovering the boor's neglect to fulfil his engagement to pay his creditor, he now not only refused to work any longer with so faithless an employer, but had a demand upon him for four dollars, being two month's pay. The boor, however, most unjustly insisted on his serving him the remaining four months, under pretence of a contract. But no written agreement having been made and signed, in presence of a Veldcoronet, which is required to bind a Hottentot to his employer, for any stated time, the Veldcoronet discharged him for the present, without further explanation. Lebrecht, after recovering his spirits, stated his case satisfactorily to us, and on our return, I submitted it to the landdrost of Zwellendam, who sent a proper reproof to the unjust boor.

Near this place, we first met with the great thorn-bush, a mimosa, with which many parts of the country are nearly covered. It has thorns from four to six inches long. They are placed two and two, in an obtuse angle, of about ninety degrees; out of the inner centre of which proceeds, from a bud, a number of small pinnated leaves, resembling the acacia. The flower is yellow, and consists of a great number of small leaves placed in a globular form. The shape of the tree is very elegant.

Valley, near the banks of the Sonderend, without a tree to screen us by its shade from the burning rays of the sun. Before us appeared some of the lower class of hills, through which a gap admits the river Sonderend to unite with the Breede Rivier. The heat was almost insupportable, and the inside of the tent like an oven. All the butter melted, and on attempting to finish some sketches, the colour dried instantly on the paper, without permitting any washing. I found at length the inside of the waggon the most comfortable retreat, where I continued writing my diary, though the ink dried so fast within my pen, that I could hardly proceed. About six in the evening, we left this place, which, by way of distinction, we called the Hot Outspan, and after travelling for some time along the low hills above-mentioned, crossed the Breede Rivier by moon-light. Its banks are covered with wood and bushes, and its bed is full of large, rough stones. We encamped on the eastern bank for the remainder of the night.

8th. After a ride of about four hours, we crossed the Leuwe Rivier, near a pleasant farm. Its banks are very steep, and in some places formed of perpendicular rocks, resembling mud-walls in colour. Having forded another smaller stream of brackish water, we halted on a waste, with a woody dell behind, and the magnificent range of the Zwellendam mountains before us, towards which, after two hour's rest, we directed our course. The morning had been uncommonly clear, and we were enjoying the view, when suddenly clouds began to cover their tops. In a short time, we were enveloped in a dense fog, followed by heavy rain, which did not cease, till we reached Zwellendam about two P. M.

I immediately waited on the landdrost, Mr. Von Buissini, and presented the letter, written by Colonel Bird in the name of the Governor, and which, as a proof of the kind attention of his Excellency to promote every attempt to spread civilization among the Hottentots under his government, by means of Christian instruction, I beg leave to insert, especially as it proved the source of all that ease and comfort, which we enjoyed during a journey of such length, attended frequently with great difficulties and dangers. The same letter was addressed to the landdrosts of the districts of Zwollendam, George, and Uitenhagen.

SIR,

I am directed by his Excellency, the Governor, to beg your attention to the bearer, the Rev. Mr. Latrobe.

Mr. Latrobe's object in visiting your drosty, is to ascertain, whether there is any unoccupied Government-land in your district, which would be suitable for establishing an institution of Hottentots under the superintendency of the Moravian Brethren. It is his Excellency's desire, therefore, that you may be pleased to afford to this gentleman the fullest information in your power on the subject, and his Excellency will esteem any civility you may show Mr. Latrobe, as a favour done to himself.

I have the honour to be

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

*Colonial Office,
February 18, 1816.*

C. BIRD.

The landdrost, after perusing this letter, expressed his great readiness to lend every assistance in promoting an object, to which he had always shown the most favourable disposition, and was glad to be thus authorized to act consistently with his own inclinations, in affording every facility to our undertaking. He immediately proposed to give me a letter to the Veldcornets and others in his district, to be valid as far as George, requiring them to furnish us with two spans of oxen at every station, and with as many drivers, leaders, and guides, as we might want.

Though I not only felt grateful for such an indulgence, but was convinced, that we could not proceed far with our own oxen, as they already showed symptoms of great weariness, yet at first I was not disposed to accept of the landdrost's generous offer, considering myself not entitled to such distinction, and disliking the idea of becoming burdensome to the farmers, by pressing their men and cattle into our service, perhaps with injury or inconvenience to themselves. On both these subjects, however, the landdrost satisfied my mind, particularly by stating, that the farmers received a sufficient consideration for services thus performed, and had no reason to complain, since the English Government had ruled the colony. It was our intention to have purchased a spann at this place, a measure which was now superseded; and as we could spare at least one of our Hottentots, old Christian Hector, was sent home with the spann we had hired at Gnadenthal. Mr. and Mrs. Von Buissini insisted upon our taking up our abode at their house, and treated us with every mark of kindness and hospitality.

The drosty is a substantial, spacious, well-furnished mansion, and the premises much improved by the present landdrost. The town or village lies scattered, and consists of several single houses or rows of buildings, connected with each other, without much regularity. The church is a neat plain structure, without a tower. The number of inhabitants is said to be about three hundred. The situation of Zwellendam is under the highest part of a range of lofty mountains, whose rocky summits assume all manner of singular shapes. Two peaks, like truncated cones, form their principal feature, and the kloofs and beds of torrents, with which their steep sides are furrowed, have an almost terrific appearance. Parallel to their foot runs a range of low round hills, some of which are rocky, others, clothed with verdure.

9th. The oxen required by the landdrost to be furnished for us, eighteen in number, were early at hand, and the drivers in haste to proceed. Having been advised to take our own spann with us as a reserve, we appointed Lebrecht Aris to the care of them; Jeremias to drive the baggage-waggon; Leonhard Paerl to take charge of the saddle-horses, and Marcus and Johannes to attend the lighter waggon.

About nine A. M. we left the landdrost's hospitable mansion, in which we had felt ourselves quite at home. In Mr. Von Buissini, we found a friend, and a man of superior intellect and information. He speaks English fluently, as likewise German and other languages, and possesses a good library. Mrs. Buissini is a lady of most affable and benevolent character, and treated Sister Schmitt with great kindness. She also bestowed several necessary articles of provisions upon us, such as fowls, wheaten bread, and garden-fruits. At her request, Sister Schmitt visited a Hottentot maid-servant, who formerly belonged to the Groenekloof congregation, till her husband finding work in this place brought her hither. She was confined to her bed by a severe illness, and on seeing Sister Schmitt enter the room, burst into a flood of tears, exclaiming, "This, indeed, is in answer to my prayers, for I have cried incessantly unto the Lord, especially during my present illness, to grant me the favour, again to see one of my teachers."

The landdrost had mentioned the Settlement at Zuurbrack, belonging to the Missionary Society in London, about half a day's journey from Zwellendam, as worthy of our notice, and had given orders to our drivers to pass through that place, on our way to the next station at the Groot Vader's Bosch. They were civil, good-humoured people, and drove at a brisk rate, often at a sharp trot. The road was good, the weather pleasant, clear, and cool, and our party in excellent spirits. As we left Zwellendam, the views to the south became more extensive, and the mountains to the north assumed a milder character, till the view of the high range was intercepted by lower hills.

Farms are not numerous in this part of the country. We crossed several brooks, and regretted to see a good deal of water, that precious fructifying agent in this dry land, running to waste, though the valleys appeared capable of culture. But the land allotted to each farm occupies so large a tract of country, and labourers are so scarce, that some apology may be made for the inhabitants. Since the slave-trade has been abolished, and the slaves remaining in the colony are sold at an enormous price, particularly if they are skilled in any art, the services of Hottentots are more wanted in the cultivation of the land. Thus they have been taught, better to know their own value, and will no longer submit to the treatment they formerly received. Being both by Dutch and English laws a free nation, they cannot be compelled to serve an unjust or tyrannical master, and it is solely owing to their natural indolence, that many of them remain in poverty and misery. The effect of Christian instruction contributes most towards raising them from the abject and wretched state, into which they had been plunged, by gradually changing their dispositions, and making them obedient, not only to the precepts of the Gospel, but to all those moral and civil obligations which it inculcates, as they are successively explained to them by their teachers.

About an English mile above a pleasant farm, called Rotterdam, we arrived at the Bueffeljagd's Revier. The bushes covering both banks near the ford consist chiefly of the mimosa. Having crossed the river, we turned to the left, out of the main road, under a hill, the ascent of which was covered with a profusion of large aloes: This was the first time we had seen this singular plant growing in such abundance.

The vale of the Zuurbrack is, at its entrance from the west, narrow and full of wood. The Bueffeljagd's Revier winds from side to side between steep banks, and must be forded twice, before the missionary Institution can be approached. A few Hottentot women, imitating the custom at Gnadenthal, came out to meet us, and walking alongside of the waggons, bid us welcome with a hymn. The valley widens near the settlement, and appears to be a spot well chosen for the purposes of such an institution. We were received by Mr. and Mrs. Seidenfaden, her mother, and brother, and his assistant, Mr. Wimmer, with great kindness. After some conversation and refreshment, we proceeded to see Mr. Seidenfaden's gardens, which are well laid out. After dinner, we walked with him through the Hottentot village, which at present consists of one row of huts on the north side of the valley. Some of them we entered, and conversed with the inhabitants. They were friendly, and expressed their thankfulness for the instruction they receive, and for the zeal with which the missionaries endeavour to promote their temporal and spiritual welfare.

Mr. Seidenfaden is a man of an active, benevolent mind, and generous spirit. He has himself built a good substantial house, with a spacious hall, in which he meets his congregation, and keeps school with the children and young people. The Missionary Society in London, under whose direction he acts, have not as yet thought proper to build a church in this place, and the small sum he could raise for the purpose, proved quite inadequate to the undertaking. A beginning, however, was made on an eminence near the house, but his expectations failing, the work remains unfinished. He appears to deserve more encouragement, for the situation is such, that in time a considerable settlement might be formed.

After a pleasant stay of about four hours with this worthy family, we set out for the next station, accompanied by Mr. Seidenfaden and his brother-in-law on horseback, to direct us in crossing the river, the banks of which are so very steep, that all the skill of Hottentots in driving was required, to bring the waggons and oxen safely through the water. At one of the fords, an ox, becoming wild, disengaged himself from the yoke. But we were in a most romantic place, in which some detention was not unpleasant. While the Hottentots were pursuing the frightened beast, the waggons remaining stationary in the midst of the stream, we contemplated with delight the surrounding scenery. To the right, the water rushed forward between steep, woody banks, in the deep shade of overspreading trees, towards a range of low hills, enclosing the valley to the south. To the left, rose a dark, gloomy forest, ascending a deep kloof, between perpendicular rocks, and stretching along the foot of the mountains, whose tops were enveloped in black clouds, rendered more frowning, as contrasted with the splendour of a bright sun in the west, beautifully lighting up every part of the valley, while the sides of the mountains were buried in shade. The river seemed to fly from the dark recesses of the kloof towards a milder region. Close by the ford lay the skeleton of an ox; wolves, jackals, and tygers, having feasted on its flesh, of which but little was left for Mr. Seidenfaden's large dog. This fine animal had accompanied us, and now improved the opportunity of making a meal of the remainder; for the dogs belonging to African farmers and Hottentots are not regularly fed, but live upon what they find. Having secured the wild ox, we proceeded, and soon took leave of our worthy friends, who returned to Zuurbrack, with our best wishes and prayers for God's blessing to rest upon their labours.

Our road lay through the valley, and as long as it was light, we feasted our eyes on the delightful scenery, till we reached the farm of Mr. Van Ass, in Groot Vader's Bosch. This was the first boor's house, to which we had recourse for a night's lodging. When we produced the landdrost's order for Vorspann, Mr. Van Ass made many difficulties, complaining, that it put him to great inconvenience to harbour and forward us on our journey; that he had no beds, and could render us no assistance in providing supper; though there were ten or more slaves and Hottentot maids in his kitchen, unemployed. At length, he showed us into a room, where we might put down our mattresses, and even agreed, that Sister Schmitt might have the use of the kitchen-fire. Finding us satisfied with his arrangements, he brightened up a little, and entered into conversation with civility. As it turned out a wet night, our Hottentots slept in the tent.

10th. A thick fog covered the mountains, but while we were at breakfast, it cleared away, and presented to our view a charming landscape. Mr. Van Ass's premises seem formerly to have been kept in better order than they are at present. He is a bachelor, and his domestics appeared to be an idle crew. Sister Schmitt, having discovered, that several of the women professed to belong to the Zuurbrack congregation, though they very seldom went thither, represented to them, how much they had to answer for, when so fayourable an opportunity was afforded them to hear the word of God for their salvation, if they made light of it, neglecting the means, and even dishonouring the cause of the Gospel by their lives and conversation. Her reproof, delivered with great mildness, seemed to make some impression upon them. On our leaving the place, several of them expressed a wish to have more conversation with her, as we slowly followed the waggons up the hill, and seemed much affected at taking leave.

The Groot Vader's Bosch is a forest retained by Government, the trees growing chiefly in the kloofs and vallies, which intersect the high range of mountains. As we proceeded, the appearance of the country grew less interesting. Very few farms are seen in the wide waste towards the south. Some kivits, or plovers, were the only birds, and a duyker (antelope) the only quadruped we saw, during several hours' ride. The low hills are covered with aloes, and the vales rich in bushes, chiefly of the mimosa kind.

At two o'clock, we reached Mr. Lombard's farm, on Duyvenhoek's Revier. This gentleman is a relation of Mr. Von Helsland, on Bock Revier. As he had been a commandant of the volunteer farmers, in the Caffre war, and was well acquainted with all the country about the Chamtoos and Klein Reviers, I showed him the list of Government-places I had received, through the kindness of the Colonial Secretary, which led him to give us some interesting information concerning the situation, nature of the soil, and present possession of these places, by which, in some measure, we were directed in our future inquiries. He seemed anxious to detain us, and finding in him a very intelligent and well-informed man, we would willingly have availed ourselves of his friendly invitation, had we not wished to make the best use of our time in the prosecution of our journey. For the services Mr. Lombard rendered to General Dundas in the Caffre war, he was presented with a very elegant gun. His farm is well built, and situated upon a rising ground, commanding a fine prospect across the river, towards the mountains. The walls of the hall, which is the common room of the family, were decorated with French prints, more highly finished in their execution, than decent in their subjects. On taking leave, Mr. Lombard pressed us, on our return, to spend three or four days with him, when he would take us to the sea-coast, show us the surrounding country, hunt with Mr. Melville, and, as a sum-mum bonum, treat us with oysters.

Both in approaching to, and leaving this farm, we had to cross the Duyvenhoek's Revier, which, by some partial rain on the hills, had acquired both depth and rapidity. The road to our next station was interesting only by a full view of the grand ridge of mountains, which here assumed a different character, appearing in detached parties, with a high peak towards the west, and a precipitous descent to the east.

About six in the evening, we arrived at Mr. Piet Du Preez's farm, where we met with a cordial reception. We found here a Mr. S. a smith by trade, who had formerly belonged to our Church, and resided in some of the settlements of the Brethren in Germany. He seemed much pleased to meet with countrymen in the Brethren, Schmitt and Stein. Two English dragoons were as much delighted to see three of their countrymen, but told us, that in consequence of the capture and punishment of five of the boors, engaged as principals in the late rebellion, the people in the Langekloof were ill-disposed towards the English, and very sulky. As the weather was fair, we wished to proceed another stage, but the family protested against it, the road being too bad for night-travelling. It was well we staid within doors, for unexpectedly a thick fog announced a change of weather.

11th. HAVING dispatched a horseman to the next Veldcornet for relays, and taken leave of our kind host and hostess, we left their hospitable mansion about seven in the morning. Mr. Du Preez is a lively old man, and constantly wears a large round hat. His house is well built, and the farm extensive. The oxen he had furnished were extremely wild, and set off in a gallop. They almost ran over our Hottentot Johannes, as he was tacking through the bushes, down the hill, towards the river. We passed through several pretty vales, full of shrubs and low wood, in which the thorn-bush and milk-bush, (fiscus), a tree not unlike a Portugal laurel, were most abundant. The hills are low and heathy. In one of these sequestered vales, we made halt to breakfast. Near the road lay the carcasses of three large vultures, half devoured by beasts of prey. About noon we arrived at Zeekoegat, on Vat Revier, a large farm belonging to Mr. Cobus Du Preez. An avenue of noble oaks leads up to the house. The buildings are substantial, and surrounded by rich plantations, unlike most of the farmers' dwellings in this country. The master very civilly came out to meet us, and prevailed on us to stay with him, till the heat of the day had somewhat abated. After dinner, Mr. Du Preez walked with us into the grounds, where oranges, lemons, figs, peaches, and other fruits grow in rich abundance. This is owing to the quantity of water, by which he is able to irrigate all his orchards, gardens, and vineyards. Seeing some Hottentot women sitting under the shade of a large orange tree, Brother Schmitt addressed them, asking some questions relating to their knowledge of spiritual things, as one of them professed to belong to Mr. Seidenfaden's congregation. She seemed however, to have little concern about the way of salvation, and very seldom attended the ministry of that good man, or visited his institution. She said, her name was written down, and thought that enough; but Brother Schmitt very earnestly admonished her and her companions, not to neglect the opportunity afforded them to hear the word of God, nor to be content with having their names written down in man's book, but to turn in faith to Christ the only Saviour, that they might, on the great day of judgment, find their names written in the book of life. They seemed attentive to his serious but affectionate address.

The view up the vale of the Vat Revier is grand, high mountains forming the back-ground. One of them has a remarkable precipice towering above the other summits. We left Zeekoegat towards evening, and had two young lively slaves for drivers, but the leader was a poor timid old fellow, who could hardly creep along. We therefore dismissed him, at a place where he had a home, and made Johannes leader, which, though an office inferior to that of driver, he willingly undertook. The slaves drove their oxen at a gallop, sometimes to the endangering of our safety, on a road full of holes and slopes. But our remonstrances were answered only by good-humoured laughter. After travelling for some miles, we found the chain of hills, to which the road had long run parallel, take another direction, and assume a different appearance, presenting an outline of Table-Mountain's, round-topped, triangular, conical, or gently-sloping summits. We were sorry, that by darkness and fogs, they were so soon hid from our view. About nine o'clock we arrived at an outspan-place, Soete-Melk's-Valley, and encamped in the field. The name did not deceive us, for the good-natured baas of the adjoining farm, coming out to meet us, offered to supply as much sweet milk, as we might want. We therefore sent a man to his house, and got enough for supper, and to fill our bottles in store for the next day. Our friendly neighbour spent about an hour in conversation with us. He was eager after news, and of a more inquisitive turn than many of his brethren. My fire-box surprised and amused him much. Being a dealer in timber, he gave us some interesting information concerning the state of the woods.

As the pressed oxen were rather wild, and too near home, to be left loose in the waste, without danger of their escaping, the men tethered them to the waggon, by which we were greatly annoyed during the night. Our own oxen, which we had not seen since we left Zwellendam, overtook us at this place, and as the tent happened to be pitched on a grassy spot, they soon came browsing close to it. This disturbed us a little, but we were completely roused, when some of them began to fight with the strangers, and it required all the attention of our men to keep them in order.

12th. After a restless night, we broke up early, but not before our talkative neighbour had paid us another visit. We proceeded through a dull country, the weather cloudy, and the views obscured. We saw many rehbocks, and Marcus Moses was sent, but in vain, to get us some venison. Between nine and ten we arrived at Cornelius Snyman's farm, Tygerfonteyn, deriving its name from the death of a Hottentot by a tyger, some years ago. Here we hoped to find oxen, but, through the blunder of the Veld-cornet, were disappointed. Mr. Snyman and his wife were civil people, and we all soon found employment, Mr. Melville and I in writing and drawing; Sister Schmitt, with the help of the maids, in attending to our linen, and the Brethren Schmitt and Stein, in following some ostriches, with the vain hope of shooting one of these wary, and swift-footed birds. To please the children, I set up my microscope, and though some were afraid to peep into it, the father and mother, and a little boy seemed highly gratified by the exhibition. Unpleasant as in many respects this delay appeared, yet we were glad, that we had met with a friendly family, who did all in their power to assist us.

13th. Our generous host and hostess would take nothing for what we had enjoyed at their house, but even provided us, gratis, with milk and bread for our journey. For a fine fat sheep, Mr. Snyman was satisfied to take two Gnadenthal knives, called here Boschlemmers, the goodness of which has long recommended them to the inhabitants of the colony. From hence we travelled through a bushy country, with a vast variety of flowering shrubs and plants, many of which we brought into the waggons to examine. They afforded us great gratification, though our want of knowledge in botany made it impossible to describe them. After a ride of nearly four hours, we forded the Gowritz Revier, which here has a sandy bed, enclosed between low, heathy hills. The descent to the river is very steep. We passed between two farms, both of which had received orders to furnish oxen. But we were again disappointed, and obliged to encamp. The plain was almost covered with a species of large black beetles, apparently journeying from place to place, disgusting in their shape, and slowly crawling upon every thing we laid down. Mean-while Mr. Melville found an old friend, Mr. Petersen, Government-Surveyor of the district of George, who had just arrived, and to whom he mentioned the object of our journey. The surveyor being well acquainted with every part of the district, his information was of much use to us, but he gave us no hopes of finding any unoccupied land suitable for a missionary settlement, either near George or in Mossel-Bay.

To the latter place, we had resolved to bend our course, both by advice of Mr. Von Buissini, and in consequence of an offer of land made to me by the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Alexander, in case we should find his estate an eligible situation.

Brother Schmitt was here taken very ill with violent head-ache, and general weakness. When we therefore had procured oxen, we were obliged to proceed gently, as he found the motion of the waggon almost insupportable. The slave-boy, given us for a leader, was a remarkably lively lad, and, with his stories and mimickries, afforded to our Hottentots a good deal of merriment. In general, we seldom found the slaves, either old or young, much depressed by their situation. They appeared full of vivacity and mirth.

About six o'clock we arrived at a farm on Stinkrevier. Mr. Melville accompanied me into the yard, where we sought in vain for the proprietor. Only one Hottentot maid seemed left in charge of the premises. Half a hundred geese, and as many ducks, turkies, and fowls, having probably been accustomed to be fed about this time, came running and flying towards us, all cackling and crying out for food. They followed us to the waggons, and we could not refuse a meal to such hungry supplicants.

Having left our orders for a relay, we proceeded towards the river, which was nearly dry, and pitched our tent for the night. The moon shone bright, but the air was very cold. The Hottentots, therefore, after making a hearty meal, retired into the waggons to sleep.

14th. Early, we were disturbed by a great bleating of oxen and other noises close to the tent. We rose to see what was the matter, and perceived, that about fifty head of cattle, passing on to a grazing place, according to their usual custom, greeted the strangers. Being tethered to the waggons, and not able to follow, the latter answered by moans, expressive of their disappointment, some even making serious attempts to disengage themselves. This serenade broke our rest, and prepared us for an early departure. No oxen being furnished by the farmer, we detained those we had in possession, and after a ride of two hours, arrived at a farm called Kleinberg. Here we were received by the farmer Muller, with much civility, and though we had sent Leonhard forward with the landdrost's order to the Veldcoronet, and had no written commands to produce, he readily furnished us with the two spans required, supplied us with various articles we wanted; and, having a smithy adjoining his house, permitted Brother Schmitt, who understands something of the trade, to convert an iron bar into a pot-hook, to be used at our nocturnal fires; which proved a desirable acquisition.

Few Hottentots live in this part of the country, and those we saw seemed to be in miserable plight. At Kleinberg, we found an old grey-headed man. On putting a few questions to him, we discovered him to be quite ignorant, not even knowing that there was a God, who had created all things, and by whose mercy and power all things subsist. Brother Schmitt endeavoured to make him acquainted with that, which surely to a man on the brink of the grave, must be of most importance, the love of God in Christ Jesus. The poor old man seemed to listen with eagerness, while the missionary explained to him the way of salvation, and how a sinner, such as he acknowledged himself to be, might be pardoned and reconciled by the merits of the sufferings and death of our Saviour. He then exhorted him not to forget what he had heard, but before this life was ended, to cry for mercy and the remission of his sins, that he might be accepted of God, and depart into the mansions of peace and bliss. This the poor old Hottentot promised to do.

We now proceeded towards Mossel-Bay, and got on with speed. The country through which we travelled, was uninteresting. We passed by a farm belonging to Mr. Alexander, and turning to the left, towards the coast, soon came in sight of the buildings erected by Government in the bay. On our arrival, we were very civilly received and hospitably entertained by Mr. Abue, the store-keeper. He is by birth a Dane. While dinner was preparing, I took a walk to the sea-shore. The rocks consist chiefly of sand-stone, coloured in some places by iron or manganese, with veins of quartz. I had broken several pebbles by throwing them upon the rocks, for want of a hammer, when a large fragment flew into my face, threw my spectacles aside, and wounded my cheek close to my right eye. For some minutes, it put me to a considerable degree of pain, and I was apprehensive of injury done to the eye itself; but on bathing the wound with salt water, it ceased to bleed, and the pain left me. I felt thankful to God, that my glasses were not broken, and forced into the eye by the stone. Our friendly host applied some camphorated brandy, by which all inflammation was prevented.

Not being able to obtain any oxen, we were under the necessity of remaining some hours at this place, to give to those we had brought with us sufficient time for food and rest. Mr. Abue showed us the premises, and went with us into the king's store-house, built as a deposit for corn, to be purchased at a fixed price from the farmers, and shipped off to Capetown for Government-use. Though the benevolent intention of Government to furnish a market for the farmers has not altogether been fulfilled, since the latter think the price given not a sufficient reward for their trouble in raising and delivering the corn, yet by some arrangement, it is hoped, that the settlement in Mossel-Bay will be of use, in affording the means of disposing of the produce of the country. The coasts of the bay are bushy, and aloes grow in great abundance on the surrounding hills. Formerly the extract of aloes, used in medicine, fetched a price sufficiently high to make it a lucrative trade; but at present, since the article has become more common, and the price fallen, it appears to be not worth the farmer's while to attend to it, as we were informed by several persons inhabiting the neighbourhood.

About three in the afternoon, we left Mossel-Bay, and went on to Hartenbosch. The road was bad, and led through a forest of large bushes of various kinds, among which we started some wild peacocks, and a bushbuck antelope; but it was impossible to follow them, the great quantity of thornbush, Indian figs, and other prickly plants rendering the thicket almost impenetrable. We passed by another farm belonging to Mr. Alexander, lying between low round hills clothed with aloes and low wood.

At Hartenbosch, we found friendly faces, and excellent quarters for the night. Mr. Meyer and his whole family gave us the kindest reception, and seemed much pleased with our visit. They were amused with the fire-box, drawing utensils, portable writing desk, ten-bladed knife, and other English ware in our possession. We visited also an old carpenter, who has lived here many years. The furniture in Mr. Meyer's house, made of stink-wood, yellow-wood, and other curious woods, does him great credit, both as to beauty and strength.

As it turned out a very boisterous evening, we thanked God for having found shelter in the house of so good a man. He hoped the unfavourable state of the weather would detain us, and give him more of our company.

15th. When we awoke in the morning, the sky was covered with black clouds, and it lightened and thundered much. At eight it cleared up, though the thunder continued to roar all round the horizon. Our friendly host, at breakfast, gave us an account of the many wild beasts that haunt the woods and bushy coasts of the bay, where they have good cover. Tygers and wolves now and then commit depredations; wild buffaloes are sometimes seen; but wild dogs are numerous and most to be dreaded. A wolf hunts only at night, is cowardly, and may be guarded against, by various means; but the wild dogs go in troops, and hunt night and day. They attack every living animal, and the "dread of man" is but slight upon them. Mr. Meyer related, that if they have killed a tame animal, they will quit it, on being attacked by man, but not, if their prey is wild game. Not long ago, a troop of them hunted a rehbock into his neighbour's yard. The farmer sallied forth with his gun to drive off the pursuers, and secure the fugitive for his own table, but was instantly attacked by the dogs, and his life with difficulty saved by his people. Porcupines are numerous; serpents creep into the poultry-yards and houses and do much mischief. Our host getting up in the dark, and walking into the hall, felt something like a rope about his legs. On calling for a light, he discovered it to be a yellow serpent. Had he accidentally trod upon it, he would have been bitten by the venomous reptile.

About nine o'clock, we took leave of the family. Nowhere have we yet met with a more cordial reception than at Hartenbosch.

We entered a kloof between hills moderately high, intersected by charming little glens and coves, filled with luxuriant bushes and many aloes. A pleasant brook ran winding down the vale. But we had not long enjoyed the delightful scenery among these interesting and ever-varying hills and dales, before black clouds came sweeping along their summits with lightning, thunder, and rain. When the rain ceased, and the sun began again to shine upon us, the air was filled with millions of small flying ants, each having four wings. Many fell upon our clothes, and stuck to the wet coverings of the waggons, while the main army passed over us, in appearance like a cloud of dust. From the hills, we descended into a grassy plain with a ridge of higher mountains before us. On a peak in the fore-ground stood two remarkable rocks, shaped so as to resemble decayed castles. Mr. Melville and Stein followed some wild peacocks for some time, but in vain. After fording the Little Sout Revier in two places, we halted on the banks of the great Brak Revier. Here we saw our own oxen feeding, having advanced no farther towards George, and we were glad to find them in good condition.

From hence we sent our old groom, Leonhard, to Mr. De Watt's house, where oxen had been ordered for us, to desire that they might meet us on the banks of the river. The old man gave such an account of the dignity of his employers, that the honest farmer was soon awed into compliance, and sent his son with the beasts, with an apology for not waiting upon us in person. This was the first time, that the requisition for relays had perfectly succeeded.

The vale, in which we had halted, pleased us much, and appeared to have many requisites for a settlement. But besides being occupied, we were informed, that in the rainy season it is turned into a lake, by the overflowing of the river. In all directions the scenery is beautiful. Towards the estuary, the low hills consist of white sand, their tops covered thick with bushes. The state of the tide admitting of our fording the river, we proceeded towards its eastern bank, and ascended the hills. Here the character of the soil seemed to change, and instead of iron and sandstone, which had followed us from Gnadenthal, the road glistened with bright silver-coloured mica, in small fragments of granite. The quartz was of a bluish hue, the feldspath brown, and in some stones mixed with hornblend and shoerl. On each side of the road are deep glens. Down that to the left, a broad brook hurried swiftly amidst rocky shores, and impenetrable thickets, which rose to the brow of the hill. A smaller stream glided more gently down the right-hand deeper glen, in which a considerable quantity of large timber shaded its dark recesses. The descent into it was, in many places, almost perpendicular, with rocks richly clothed with beautiful creepers, the crevices affording nourishment to their roots, and to those of a vast variety of shrubs and trees. Our walk up the hill was rendered extremely pleasant, by the view of these natural beauties, and of the hilly country we had left behind.

Having gained the summit, we arrived at an extensive, grassy plain, with a distant view of the mountains of George to the north and east. The plain is called Groeneland. At a mean solitary cottage, we quenched our thirst with some butter-milk, and travelled along a smooth road, till an unexpected steep descent seemed to arrest our progress. A rapid brook, fed by numberless small streams, precipitating themselves in cascades, from the steep and rocky banks, rushed wildly through the bottom of the glen.

Having overtaken a waggon with fourteen oxen, with a family travelling towards George, and halting near the descent, a consultation was held, and Leonhard dispatched with a horse to try the depth of the ford. The bed of the brook consisted of loose stones, over which the water passed furiously, about three feet in depth. Being no courtiers, neither party strove to take precedence of the other, but each offered to its new friends the honour of a first plunge, and as we had arrived last, we submitted to remain spectators of the extraordinary manner in which their waggon reeled from side to side through the flood, when we likewise ventured in, and got safe to shore. The thunder-showers of last night had considerably increased the waters of the brook, but the tide coming in, had now swelled it into the appearance of a large river, farther down the valley.

Having a desire to see the missionary institution called Hoogte Kraal, under the superintendency of the reverend Mr. Pacalt, sent out by the Missionary Society in London, we left the above-mentioned party to proceed alone to George, and turned to the right. The ascent from the brook led us to another grassy plain, intersected by two narrow and rocky glens, by which we arrived about six in the evening at Hoogte Kraal. We were received with much friendly attention by Mr. Pacalt, but not having a house spacious enough to harbour so large a party, he proposed, that we should put down our mattresses in his chapel, after the usual evening-service. This, however, did not begin till nine o'clock, to give the Hottentots time to return from their work in the neighbouring farms. Mean-while, the time was agreeably spent in conversation. At nine, the people were called together by the sound of a cow's horn, blown by a maid-servant, in place of a bell. About a hundred men and women attended. The men and women sit separate, as in most foreign churches, on benches, and are addressed from a table and desk, as with us. The chapel is a temporary building, with one door at the gable-end. By a judicious arrangement, therefore, on leaving it, the women go out first, then the men, and the minister follows. The service consisted of two hymns, an exposition of a portion of scripture, which this evening was the beginning of our Saviour's sermon on the mount, a prayer, and a concluding hymn. The voices of the congregation were excessively loud, and the tunes sung, some of the most lively now in use in some chapels in England, but, both in their character and the manner of singing them, bidding defiance to all solemnity and good taste. After Mr. Pacalt had spoken about two minutes, a woman began to make a strange tremulous noise. Supposing her to be suddenly seized with illness, I was surprised to find no one ready to help and lead her out, till her neighbours, catching the infection, the noise spread throughout the whole assembly, the men uttering deep groans. In his prayer, the missionary affectionately remembered us, and we were sorry to be so much disturbed, by the continuance of these jarring sounds. On expressing our astonishment at the disturbance thus occasioned to the service, Mr. Pacalt informed us, that it had been considered as a sign of conviction, by the power of the Word. But supposing even, that true conviction of sin might, in some, produce this effect, who does not see, that insincerity may easily adopt such external marks, to gain the good opinion of men, whose piety and truth being unsuspected, are willing to believe others incapable of so great a fraud. Feeling as I do for the honour of the cause we are all equally eager to promote, and highly respecting the efforts made by missionaries of every denomination, though differing from us in forms, and perhaps in opinions, as to minor points, I would humbly submit to the consideration of the directors of all missionary institutions, whether it would not be well to avoid every thing that needlessly gives occasion to the evil-minded to ridicule or oppose our labours. We have reason to take the apostle's frequent warnings to heart, that we may not "let our good be evil spoken of."

16th. After breakfast, Mr. Pacalt proceeded to show us the settlement, which is as yet but small. The cottages are placed in regular rows. The gardens are well laid out, and the Hottentots, both by precept and example, taught diligently to attend to the rearing of garden-produce of various kinds; but there are no trees, nor any plantations or nurseries. Indeed, the elevated situation of the place, and the nature of the soil, is said to be unfavourable to the growth of trees, the shade of which, however, is an almost essential requisite in an African summer.

Mr. Pacalt has a small house of two rooms. His labour is great. Every day he keeps school, and meets the congregation in the evening, being without an assistant, and having the direction and management of all the outward concerns of the establishment. He was now building a smithy.

Our Hottentots having suffered the oxen to go astray, some of us visited the people in their kraals, and conversed with them in a friendly way. Wild dogs have lately done much harm in this neighbourhood. When we were ready to set off, a Berg-adder, reported to be one of the most venomous of serpents, appeared under the oxen, and was killed. She was about two feet long, beautifully marked with a double row of multangular spots down the back, and underneath, of a silver-grey colour.

After an hour's ride across the desert, we arrived at the town of George, and immediately proceeded to the house of the landdrost, Mr. Van Kervel. He was absent, but soon returned from accompanying Mr. George Rex, an English gentleman, who possesses a large farm in Plettenberg Bay, called Melkhout Kraal. Having presented Colonel Bird's letter to the landdrost, we conversed some time on the particular business, for which we had undertaken the journey. He expressed the greatest readiness to render us every service in his power, and a wish, that we might find some land to suit our purpose, within his district. He advised us to look at a spot in Plettenberg Bay, called Jackal's Kraal, which, though rejected by Dr. Van der Kemp, as not sufficiently large, might yet suit us, and under cultivation, be made a fit dwelling for a Christian Hottentot congregation of about five hundred persons, having also the convenience of conveyance by water, between the bay and Capetown.

After some consultation, we resolved to take the landdrost's advice. He offered every facility to enable us to perform the journey; proposing also, that we should stay at his house till Monday morning, that he might send messages to the Veldcornets, both in Plettenberg Bay and in the Lange Kloof, to furnish us with oxen at the different stations, and prevent delay. We determined accordingly to spend another day with this worthy man, of whose excellent character we had heard many a true report; far short, however, of what we found it to be. In the afternoon, he invited several friends to meet us, with whom we spent a very pleasant evening. The landdrost being a great lover of music, I did not want much entreaty to play for him many of Haydn's and Mozart's compositions, which, though familiar to me, were new to him, and seemed to afford him great delight. When the company had retired, we took a walk to see the new church now building, after a design of Mr. Petersen, the Government Surveyor. The outer walls and roof were finished. It will be a handsome structure in the Grecian style, and contain from a thousand to fifteen hundred people, but without a steeple, on account of the high winds, or rather, the low state of the town-purse. The clergyman's house will be placed on one, and the school on the other side of the church, forming a handsome range of buildings.

17th. Being Sunday, we prepared to go to church. Service is now performed in a farm-house, the inner walls being taken out, so as to form a spacious room, holding about two hundred people.

In the morning, the whole country was enveloped in a thick fog, but it dispersed during the forenoon. We accompanied the landdrost in his travelling waggon, drawn by four horses, to the temporary church, and found an assistant, reading a sermon to about sixty hearers. It was a dry discussion of doctrinal points, with an attempt, in the usual way, to prove the doctrine of particular election and reprobation, which tended but little to edification. The reader, however, concluded with an extempore prayer, in a strain of humility and true christian charity, which seemed to proceed from his heart. We regretted, therefore, the more, that he was not left to preach the doctrine of salvation by faith in the merits of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of all repenting sinners, but obliged to unfurl the banner of a party, in reading a controversial discourse. The concluding hymn was accompanied on an organ, much out of tune. After service, we took a walk in the garden, and on our return, ascending the foot of the mountain in the waggon, visited the woods on its declivity, admiring the luxuriant growth of many large timber-trees.

George is a new district, town, and drosty, settled by Sir J. Cradock, when Governor of the Cape; Zwellendam having been divided into two separate districts, each governed by a landdrost, Heemraaden, and other officers. The town has about one hundred inhabitants. The houses are two stories high, having an "erker," or bow-window over the door, They stand detached from each other by intermediate gardens, and form a broad street facing the drosty, or landdrost's mansion, from which, turning in a right angle towards the south, another street has been begun, containing the church, parsonage and school-house. The town is watered, rather scantily, by the Zwart Revier, a small stream from the mountains, but which, unlike others, flows both in the dry and rainy season.

After dinner, the reverend Mr. Herold, minister of George, having returned from Uitenhagen, called on the landdrost, to make a report of his attendance on the five rebellious boors, who were executed last Saturday in that district. He gave a most melancholy account of that event. The hangman was a black. The halters were too weak, or rather, as some suspected, intentionally cut; but no sooner had the delinquents been turned off, and the platform removed, than four of the five fell from the gallows. Having unfortunately been persuaded to believe, that by English custom, a man thus falling down is free, the poor wretches cried for mercy, and one, addressing the by-standers, exclaimed, that by this accident it was made manifest, that God would not permit them to be put to death. The landdrost, Colonel Cuyler, was, however, obliged to let justice take its course, and other halters being procured, they were launched into eternity. The clergyman described them all as well prepared to die, acknowledging the justice of their sentence, and appearing truly penitent. Not many spectators attended; but their wives and relatives were present, which is hardly to be explained by the standard of English feeling. No disturbance whatever took place, a party of dragoons and the Cape regiment keeping guard. This is said to be the first time, that any African's descendants from Europeans, have suffered death for crimes deemed capital in Europe. Government has often extended mercy to such as deserved condign punishment, but it seems only to have had that effect, that the rebels believed no Government to have the courage to take away their lives, for crimes committed against the state. It was, therefore, necessary to make an example, and out of twenty-four condemned to die, five of the most notorious offenders had been selected for the purpose. The rest were punished with imprisonment, forfeiture, or banishment. The reverend Mr. Herold seemed greatly agitated, and declared, that the impression, made on his mind by so dreadful a catastrophe, would not soon be effaced.

CHAPTER VIII.

Departure from George. Beautiful Scenery. Description of the defiles of Kayman's Gat and Trekata'kou. Arrival at Mr. Zaayman's farm. The Veldcoronet's account of tygers. Ford in the Ruygte Valley. Accidents which befel some of the party. First view of the Knysna. Arrival at Melkhout Kraal. Survey of Jackal's Kraal in Plettenberg Bay. Objections of the Hottentots to a settlement at that place.

18th. HAVING dispatched our letters to Gnadenthal, with an account of our journey and transactions, since we left Zwellendam, we prepared for our departure. Mr. Van Kervel had provided two spans, each of fourteen strong oxen, to bring us across the dreadful defiles between George and Plettenberg Bay. He also furnished me with an order for relays as far as Uitenhagen, and with letters to Mr. Rex, and a list of places in our route. To Mr. Zaayman also, a farmer, at whose house we were to spend the first night, directions were sent to put us forward on our return from Jackal's Kraal, in case we took the road over the Duivelskop into the Lange Kloof. Our own span of twelve oxen, which we had brought hither from Zwelendam, were left, by his advice, at George, as they would serve us on our return, but were too weak to be of any use in crossing the mountains.

At eight o'clock we took leave of this worthy man. I have seldom, if ever, met with a character so justly deserving all the praise bestowed upon him, for the exercise of those qualities which distinguish a good magistrate, master, and friend. Not long ago he lost an amiable partner, of whom the servants and slaves in the family spoke with the sincerest esteem, and tears of regret. To us he behaved like a father, felt interested in the success of our undertaking, and it would be ingratitude in the extreme, not to add our tribute of thankful praise to the general voice. To Hottentots and slaves he conducted himself not with that severe, repelling air, assumed by so many, who think themselves belonging to a higher class of beings, but with friendly condescension, calling forth both their reverence and love. Our Hottentots spoke often with gratitude of the goodness of the landdrost of George. In his house, peace and order reigned, and his friends and relatives, among whom was his nephew, Mr. Du Toit, treated us with the greatest civility. On taking leave, he repeated his pressing invitation, on our return, again to make his hospitable mansion our home.

The farmer, to whom the oxen belonged, and the Veldcoronet, accompanied us, to lend assistance in passing through the defiles of Kayman's Gat, (the crocodile's cove), and Trekata'kou, (the maiden's ford), by which we had to enter Plettenberg bay. Early in the morning, thick fogs had again spread themselves over the mountains, and we began to fear an unpleasant day, and the loss of the romantic views Mr. Van Kervel had described, as awaiting us in our way. But the sun dispersed the mists, and about noon the atmosphere became remarkably clear. We were extremely delighted with the beautiful woods and glens, upon which we soon entered, and pronounced the environs of George, flat as its own situation appears, to be as interesting and romantic, as any part of the country we had yet seen. In about an hour's time, passing by the farm to which our oxen belonged, they all on a sudden turned short round, preferring to graze at their own quarters, rather than to toil through the defiles before us. It was with some difficulty that they were made to proceed.

Our road lay in a line nearly parallel to the high range of mountains, which here take a direction towards the Indian ocean. After crossing several pleasant and well-wooded vales, we reached Kayman's Gat, and found the description given of it by the landdrost, by no means exaggerated. The view of the glen is both magnificent and terrific. On leaving the waggons to walk down the steep, we began to fear for their safety, and our apprehensions were not lessened by listening to stories, told on the road by the Hottentots, of misfortunes experienced by travellers, whose waggons were broken, and their cattle killed in the descent, especially in stormy weather. At first, the road slopes down gradually through a thicket, with larger trees interspersed. A deep ravine to the right receives the brook Zwart Revier, the same which passes by the drosty at George, which, rushing over precipitous rocks below the road, and out of sight, causes a great roaring of hidden waters, and adds much to the grandeur of the scene. It is not so much its steepness, which renders the passage of Kayman's Gat so dangerous, as the extreme unevenness of the road, if road that may be called, where, as yet, art has not assisted nature, and the traveller must pass over rocks, in steps of from one to two feet perpendicular height, the waggons bouncing down, reeling from side to side, and but for the management of Hottentots accustomed to such service, in continual danger of over-setting. They support the waggon, by thongs fastened to each side, pulling with all their might, either to the right or left, as otherwise, in several places, the waggons, with all their contents, and the poor beasts staggering before them, would be precipitated into the abyss beneath. Long before we had reached the bottom of the glen, we were convinced, that our own oxen would not have been able to perform this service. The poor animals seemed often quite confused; the shaft-oxen being almost thrown down, the waggon nearly falling upon them, and the rest of the spann sometimes hurried forward to draw, and then again kept back to prevent mischief. It being ebb-tide, we passed the Kayman's Revier, which flows through the glen into the Indian ocean, without difficulty, and gave a few moments' rest to our frightened cattle, upon whose strength we were going to draw still more largely, to work our waggons up the rocky acclivities of the eastern bank. The view of the glen from below is majestic. The steeps on both sides are clothed with a noble forest. Strata of red rock, shelving down the western bank, form a singular contrast with the lively green of the bushes on the slopes between them. A deep chasm or rent receiving the Zwart Revier, as above described, divides the bank, and forms the Gat, or crocodile's cove, in the dark recesses of which a small water-fall glistens, by the admission of some faint light from above. It is said, that formerly crocodiles were found here in great numbers, making this chasm their chief place of resort. But they have long since withdrawn, and left to man full possession. Now and then, a leguan is seen, and the woods and glens afford pretty safe haunts for various descriptions of wild beasts. Several glens meet here, all filled with wood, through which mountain-torrents swell the revier. It must be crossed at low water, by which the time of our departure from George had been measured.

The eastern bank was, if possible, more steep and rugged in its ascent than the western. The baggage-waggon took the lead, but having laboured hard for about two hundred paces, the oxen refused to stir another step. No shouts of the drivers, cracking of whips, or hard blows, would make the poor dispirited beasts move forward; but when farther urged, they turned sharp round, and threw the whole spann into such confusion, that there was some danger of the waggon rolling down and dragging the shaft-oxen backwards. It was therefore necessary to bring up twelve of the second spann to their assistance, and after a long time spent in unyoking the former, placing them again in order, and adding the latter, it afforded a singular sight to see twenty-six oxen, with all their might working the waggon up the layers of rock, of which the road consisted; every five minutes resting to take breath. After the heavy waggon had reached the summit, both spanns were sent down to fetch up the travelling waggon, which, being lighter, was more easily accomplished.

It is impossible to describe all the romantic glens and singular scenery, with which this region abounds.

The farmer, notwithstanding the excessive fatigue his cattle had suffered, after short rest determined to proceed, without an out-spann at Barbier's Kraal, as proposed. Our road lay now through a thick wood, in which many a mighty tree seems to have yielded to the axe. Bushrope, or Bavianstau, a species of creeper resembling a rope, grows here in abundance, and nearly envelopes some of the loftiest trees, to the destruction of their growth and beauty. In the woods, a number of Hottentots and slaves were busily employed in sawing, and preparing planks, beams, and shingles. In about an hour, we arrived at Trekata'kou, the second grand defile, justly dreaded by travellers. The descent from the west, though rugged and steep, is not attended with more difficulty than many others in this mountainous country. The view towards the mass of hills to the north, is remarkably grand and beautiful.

On these occasions, Brother Schmitt always attended the waggon, and, depending on his skill, precaution, and advice, we could rest satisfied, that every care was taken to prevent mischief, and overthrow. After crossing a rapid mountain-stream at the bottom of the glen, rushing through the dark recesses of a wild wood, over a stony bed, and forming, to the left of the road, a large pool under some horizontal strata of overhanging rock, crowned with beautiful trees and shrubs, we beheld the eastern bank with some degree of dismay. The road ascended with a steepness, which seemed to baffle the attempt of any beasts to draw up the lightest weight. The travelling-waggon, however, reached the top after great exertion, but the other required both spans to be yoked to it. The poor exhausted oxen made more objections to put forth their remaining strength at this place, than at Kayman's Gat, and shouts and lashes seemed to have lost their effect. They turned round, entangled themselves with the tackle, and more than once, ten or twelve of them were obliged to be unyoked, to bring them again into order. We were above an hour working the waggon up the cliffs.

This afforded time for some examination of the stone of which the mountain is formed. Towards the bottom of the defile, huge blocks of granite lie dispersed upon the surface, but higher up, the chief stone is sand-stone, with iron and quartz, as usual. The granite is beautiful, with a great quantity of bright, silver-coloured mica, in large flakes, and in some instances chrystalized. The feldspath and quartz are much decomposed. Iron has inserted itself, and seems to be the cause both of speedy decomposition, and of the division of some of the blocks into irregular strata. When protected within the bowels of the earth, this species of granite may be of a more durable quality, and some of the larger blocks at the bottom of the glen were so hard, that my hammer and cold chissels made but little impression upon them. Of what the strata of rocks beyond the pool might consist, I was not able to discover, their surface being covered with red lichen, moss, creepers and ivy.

After sunset, we closed the adventurous business of the day, and arrived at Mr. Zaayman's farm. The houses, or hovels, are wretchedly constructed, but the inhabitants were friendly. The farmer and several other men came out and received us with much civility, shaking hands, as is the custom of the country, and bidding us welcome in the Dutch style. Our tent was pitched in the field, and we were soon provided with a good supper, being our only meal on this day. While it was preparing, Mr. Melville went with me, to pay a visit to the farmer in his dwelling, braving the attack of an host of dogs, to whose cowardly barking we could pay no attention, having carefully to mind our balance on the stepping stones, over which we passed through the deep mud and filth surrounding the premises. We sat some time with the family, the Veldcoronet, and some visitors, and obtained much information on various subjects, connected with our future progress. My fire-box was also exhibited, to the utter astonishment of all present. Before we went to rest, we returned thanks to God our Preserver, for having safely brought us thus far, through a dangerous path, which to some has even proved fatal. We were favoured with fine, dry weather, without which few travellers will venture to cross the defiles of Kayman's Gat and Trekata'kou.

19th. We rose before sunset, vainly hoping to reach Melkhout Kraal, Mr. Rex's house on the Knysna, before dark. In an hour and a half, we arrived at the Veldcoronet's house. He had accompanied us the whole way, and now invited us to partake of his breakfast. This consisted of excellent white bread and butter, sweet milk, wild honey of delicious flavour, peaches and pears, served up in the old patriarchal style. His house and premises lie on an eminence, without any trees or gardens about them. Having lately shot four tygers, he exhibited their skins. The largest measured five feet six inches, from the nose to the root of the tail, the tail itself four feet. It had seized a young heifer by the throat, whose bellowing and dying groans brought the Veldcoronet to the spot, when he shot the ferocious animal through the body. The skin was much injured, but beautiful in the brightness of its colours.

Here we saw for the first time, a proof of the devastation made by the Caffres during the late war, in the ruins of the farm-house, of which the walls only were yet standing. The inhabitants, fearing a repetition of the incursions of that restless people, have not ventured to rebuild their houses, and are now satisfied to dwell in huts, little better than those of the Hottentots. The Veldcornet's house, however, was clean and respectable.

From hence our road lay along the declivity of a hill: the mountains with their numerous woody glens, following each other in succession, appeared to great advantage, till we arrived at the farm of a widow Wyers on the Zwart Revier. The ford over the river used to be at this place, where often the water was so deep, that it proved dangerous to travellers. The new ford, though shorter, has likewise a deep, muddy bed, through which we plunged rather unpleasantly, passed over the hill on which the farm-house is situated, and reached the Ruygte Valley, where the ford across the river is both broad and deep. The waggons were emptied, and their contents, as well as ourselves, brought across the stream in a species of canoe, made of one immense tree.

The relay-oxen provided for us, being on this side, were obliged to cross the water, and we were amused by observing the different degrees of courage or fear, shown by these sober animals, in choosing their own places to enter it. Some leaped in at once, and swam boldly forward. Others, after contemplating one spot, went on to another, till they found one more shallow, which they entered warily: some found themselves deceived in the sequel, and had a longer and deeper stream to cross, than the more courageous. The delay occasioned by unpacking and repacking the waggons, was the most annoying part of the business, and it was noon, before we reached Mr. Meeling's farm, where we were hospitably entertained with thick milk, bread, and butter.

But here we had nearly met with a serious accident. Sister Schmitt, stepping into the baggage-waggon, slipped off the pole, and fell backwards, by which her head received such a severe contusion, that, for a short time, she lost her recollection, and was in much pain. Some relief was afforded by an application of bukku brandy, but her anxiety to proceed, made her unwilling to cause delay, by staying at this house to be nursed, and we ventured to continue our journey down the valley, between low, heathy eminences, for about an hour. The road then led up a steep, barren hill, from the summit of which one of the finest views we had yet seen, presented itself before us, with a well-wooded fore-ground of hill and dale, forming very picturesque scenery. The descent was rough, through deep sand, mixed with large stones, which rendered the jolting of the waggon insupportable to Sister Schmitt, who, preferred walking down the hill through the wood, though the pain in her head required rest. The Gowcomma flows through the valley, and the narrow road, rising through a thick wood, runs rather too close to its steep banks, to remove all apprehension of the waggon being precipitated into the stream. We forded this river at a place darkened by the shade of large trees, and in view of some black rocks, through which the water forces its way, and arrived safe at the house of Mr. Terblanche, a farmer of decayed fortune. Ruins of a larger house, than that which he now inhabits, made us suspect, that the Caffres in the late war had destroyed it; but it seems to have been forsaken from other causes. He was much pleased to see some company arrive to cheer him in his solitude, and treated us with bread and thick milk. Here we saw that beautiful bird called the green cuckoo, one of the few feathered inhabitants of these lonely woods, where the enlivening song of the nightingale and lark is never heard, but merely now and then the monotonous whistle of some painted finch, or the melancholy cooing of a turtle-dove.

Leaving this place, we passed along a low hill, resembling a huge bank or dyke, from whence, to the left, we had a view of a great number of low green hills, in regular rows, not improperly compared by some of us to a succession of long Atlantic waves made stationary, by being converted into land. By a turn of the road, we were unexpectedly treated with a view of the Indian ocean, the estuary of the Knysna, and Mr. Rex's farm at some distance beyond it. A steep hill and marshy plain leads to the ford, which, from the state of the tide was now impassable. Shortly before we made halt, Brother Schmitt met with an accident, which might have been even more serious, than that which befel his wife. Having left the waggon to fetch some remarkably beautiful scarlet flowers, which had attracted our attention, on venturing to enter it again, without stopping the oxen, the fore-wheel went over his right foot, and hurt it considerably.

Two of our party were now rendered invalids. Yesterday was a day, when danger was expected. To-day we had no fears. Thus we received a serious but merciful warning, that in every situation, and whatever appearances may be, we ought not to forget, that we are never safe, but under the protecting care of our heavenly Father. The sufferers, as well as our whole party, were thankful, that these accidents had not been such as to prevent our proceeding.

The out-spawn place was in a romantic situation near the ford; on all sides enclosed by woody hills, the river flowing at the foot of those to the east. Here Mr. Melville shot a bird, which proved to be a curious species of king-fisher, the wings and body beautifully marked in black and white. The report of the gun produced one of the finest echoes imaginable. A large fire being soon kindled, Sister Schmitt, with her usual zeal to sacrifice her own convenience to our comforts, which, at least, under present circumstances, deserves once for all to be noticed, insisted on our permitting her to cook supper for us, as we had made no meal all day; after which, she retired to rest in the waggon. Brother Schmitt obtained considerable relief by bathing his foot in the cold Knysan, by which inflammation was prevented.

While we were at supper, and for some time during the early part of the night, we were treated with a horrid screenade by wolves on the opposite hill. These creatures, as also tygers, are said to be numerous in this woody part of the country. We were not without fears about the safety of the oxen, belonging to the two spans we had brought, and of those provided as relays by the Veldcornet, according to order, and feeding loose near our encampment.

20th. At one o'clock in the morning, we were roused by our drivers, who were anxious to proceed, as we had the Knysna and another river to cross, before we could reach Mr. Rex's house, both being fordable only at low water. Our tent was soon struck, and preparations made for our departure, by the light of a large fire. Forging the Knysna required skill in our drivers, for the river was both deep and rapid, and the farmer, therefore, to whom the cattle belonged, thought proper to drive them himself. Having also crossed the second river in safety, we encamped on the opposite bank, between some low hills and a grove of lofty trees, and got a dish of coffee. Our two patients were both much better, for which we gave thanks to God. The morning was clear, and the air refreshing. The views also toward the estuary of the Knysna delighted us, whenever an opening in the woods and high bushes permitted us to see them. At nine o'clock, we arrived at Melkhout Kraal, and were cordially welcomed by Mr. Rex, to whom Mr. Van Kervél, with his usual kindness and consideration, had already sent notice of our approach.

We soon perceived, that it was our worthy host's intention to detain us here as long as he could. Some rest was indeed needful, and Sister Schnitt immediately availed herself of the kind offer of Mr. Rex's lady to let her servants assist us in various household concerns. Mr. Rex found in Mr. Melville's company and conversation, much pleasure and information respecting the measurement of land, being himself fond of that science. I was employed chiefly in writing, and a day spent quietly at home seemed to suit the inclination of every one of our party.

21st. The morning was foggy, and threatened rain, but about nine it became clear. A ride to the mouth of the Knysna had been proposed, but we delayed rather too long; for, by the time we arrived, the fog returned, and by degrees covered the sea and the whole coast, while the inland country remained clear. After our return, the Veldcoronet, who was directed to supply oxen to carry us to Jackal's Kraal, came to consult with us about the time of our departure. We now had much difficulty to prevail upon our hospitable host to let us depart in the morning.

After dinner, he showed us his gardens, which are at some distance from the dwelling, towards the valley. They are well stocked with a great variety of produce, but no attention has been paid to ornament.

22d. Having at length convinced Mr. Rex, that it was our duty no longer to indulge in the pleasure he proposed to give us, by prolonging our stay, but, impressed with great gratitude for the hospitable reception we had met with at his house, to proceed on the business committed to us, he consented, and resolved himself to accompany us to Jackal's Kraal. His lady having furnished Sister Schmitt with a supply of very needful stores and refreshments, we left Melkhout Kraal at ten o'clock, Mr. Rex and his son following us on horseback.

When they came up with us, Mr. Rex took a seat in the wagon. The road was uneven, but presented charming views of the surrounding country, and of the woods, which partly crown the summits, and partly adorn the sides of the hills. For some miles, the forest extends from the range of high mountains, forming the northern boundary of the bay, to the sea-coast. This region is called the Port. At a place in the wood, where two roads met, Mr. Rex related, that here, during the last invasion of the colony, a party of Caffres surprised some boors with their wives, five of whom they murdered in cool blood. One of the women begged hard for the life of her husband. After some consultation, they suddenly seized him and cut him in pieces. They carried off one of the women, and kept her for four days. They then sent a message to her husband, demanding two hundred rix-dollars, as a ransom for his wife. Fearing treachery, he refused to treat with them. Mean-while she persisted in her entreaties to be released, which at length they not only granted without ransom, but gave her a safeguard to conduct her home, having treated her well during her stay.

The immense forests of Plettenberg Bay are not without inhabitants. Elephants, buffaloes, tygers, wolves, and wild boars, having little to dread from that grand destroyer, Man, find here shelter. They seem all to have chosen their ground, some preferring the coast, and others the mountains. Thus, if not followed into their haunts, they are not often seen by the traveller, especially during the day, and we were never amused by the gambols of tygers or leopards, near the road. A few partridges were put up by Mr. Melville's dog, and one or two of them shot; but passing through these woods, nothing is heard of that cheerful chirping and singing of birds, that busy hum of flying insects, with other symptoms of animated nature, which delight and inspire the traveller through the forests of England and the European continent.

We crossed several brooks, running, all but one, from the mountains towards the sea. This perverse stream is called Samson's Revier, and taking its rise on some high land near the coast, runs rapidly towards the hills, where it is taken up by the Kierbooms Revier, and turned back. Its waters were remarkably clear and sweet, and whether from this cause, or feeling some interest in its capricious course and opposition to general rule, we here replenished our stock of fresh water. On the banks of one of the abovementioned brooks, we found the larger species of bukku, one of the most aromatic, medicinal plants in the country, and justly esteemed for its healing properties. Its leaves steeped in brandy or vinegar, and the bottle placed in the heat of the sun, emit an unctious juice, by which the fluid is rendered as thick as honey, and applied particularly for the healing of contusions, sores, and all external complaints. The Hottentots also use it for inward hurts, by mixing a spoonful of it with warm water. Its leaves are lancet-shaped and serrated.

After leaving the woods, we passed over an uninteresting, barren country, and were rather alarmed by perceiving, what the height of the trees had hidden from our view, that thick black clouds, covering the western horizon, were fast following us, thunder muttering at a distance. In a short time, a violent wind arose, which filled the air with clouds of dust. The backs of the oxen and the waggons were covered with it. Soon after, it began to lighten, thunder, and rain, and almost made us fear, that we should be obliged to give up the thoughts of visiting Jackal's Kraal to-day, and be forced to seek shelter. We persevered, however, and by the time we had reached the heights, which overlook the vale bearing this name, the rain ceased. The sudden change in the appearance of the country, afforded us much pleasure. From an insipid flat, it swelled into hills, with woody glens sloping down towards the vale. As it was now too late to examine the spot proposed for an establishment, a consultation was held; the result of which was, that we would not proceed to the next farm, but, to save time, descend with our waggons into the vale, and there encamp for the night, though the weather threatened to be rather boisterous, and the appearance of the situation below was wild, resembling a haunt of beasts of prey in undisputed possession.

Mr. Rex offered to accompany us down the hill, but having business at a farm, several miles from hence, much as we delighted in his company, and profited by his conversation, we could not accept of a service, which would have put him to much inconvenience. Here, therefore, though with sensations of regret, we took leave of our worthy and generous conductor. The Veldcornet, Mr. Van Huysteyn, accompanied us into the valley.

Previous to our arrival at Melkhout Kraal, Mr. Rex had made application to Government for the possession of Jackal's Kraal. Though no answer had been returned, I should, as in other instances, have considered this circumstance as a sufficient bar against occupation on our part, not wishing in the smallest degree to interfere with the plans of any individual in the colony, in fixing upon a tract of land, for a settlement of the Brethren's Mission.

But Mr. Rex generously declared, that he not only gladly quitted all claim to Jackal's Kraal, where he had intended only to put up a small cottage, as a sheltering place in the hunting season, but rejoiced in the hopes of seeing the land cultivated, and a settlement of Christian Hottentots formed in his neighbourhood. This declaration was now solemnly repeated, and made us determine to examine the situation, with a view to a missionary establishment.

The descent into the vale was not too steep, but finding no path, we pulled through the long grass and bushes, over stony or marshy ground, with some difficulty and uncertainty, till having reached a spot near a grove of tall trees, rising out of thick underwood, we pitched our tent on a dry place, surrounded with high bushes, which served us for fuel. Here we made two large fires, both for culinary purposes, and to frighten away any wild beasts which might be disposed to visit us during the night, this place having been reported to be the haunt of a great number of ferocious animals. But, as usually is the case, the love of frightful tales had probably created monsters in the reporter's imagination, for we neither saw nor heard any thing to give notice of their presence, and our cattle walked about the bushes, picking their food, without molestation. Yet as caution was necessary in a place unknown, and to appearance admirably suited to be a dwelling-place for wild creatures, we men went in a body, while it was yet light, to view the spot where formerly the old Hottentot captain Jackal, from whom the place derives its name, had his dwelling. Sister Schmitt and the Hottentots remained in the camp, and prepared supper. The captain's house was built upon a rising ground on the south side of the valley, probably of very perishable materials, for, besides a few broken fragments, resembling the remnants of uprights or rafters, nothing was to be seen, but some traces of a square field or garden.

Dark clouds hovering about the horizon, seemed to threaten a rainy night. It lightened much, the wind rose, and some rain fell, but besides a little annoyance from the flapping about of the curtains of our tent, which we had not sufficiently secured against the wind, we spent a quiet night in this solitary wilderness, under the protection of our Almighty Preserver, and rose early in the morning to praise Him for His mercies, and for the return of fine weather, so desirable and needful for our present undertaking.

23d. We commenced our survey, according to a plan agreed on last night. Brother Schmitt and Stein went with me to captain Jackal's hill. From hence we proceeded to a narrow kloof out of which the rivulet flows. On leaving the kloof, it buries itself under an assemblage of stones, from which, at about an hundred yards distance, it emerges in sufficient force, even in this dry season, to supply a mill. A broad path, made by wood-cutters, afforded a convenient passage into the kloof. The eastern sun shone with great brightness into it, gilding the banks on both sides. They rise steep to a considerable height, and are clothed with a romantic wood of every species of tree growing in the country, innumerable flowering plants and shrubs covering the ground. Here and there, masses of rock peep through the surrounding foliage. The rivulet rushes rapidly through the shady grove, over a stony bed, and we followed its course to a place where it forms a deep pool under a perpendicular rock. From the accidental position of the broken fragments of stone, piled up in order at its foot, this rock might, at some distance, be taken for a mass of basaltes. The water filled the whole space, and obliged us to ascend the hill. Having, however, satisfied ourselves as to the supply of water to be gained from the rivulet, we returned to the tent, much pleased with the discoveries we had made. We made a favourable report of them at an excellent breakfast, for which, through Mr. Rex's goodness, we had been provided with every requisite, sweet milk, fresh butter, and good wheaten bread, and a partridge, shot by Mr. Melville.

On reading the portions of scripture appointed for this day, rendered remarkable for being the first day, on which we could execute part of the commission given to us, we were excited to fervent prayer, that the glory of the Lord might fill this place also, if it be His gracious will, that here a settlement should be formed for the gathering together of a congregation of believers from among the Hottentot nation. To us it appeared in various respects an eligible situation, though rejected by Dr. Van der Kemp, as not sufficiently large, and by our Hottentots, as not possessing sweet grass. There is land enough for a congregation of about five hundred persons, and probably the soil might be so much improved, as to produce every necessary article of subsistence, though some place of change, at certain seasons of the year, would be required for the cattle. Conveyance from the Cape is rendered easy, by ships sailing to Plettenberg Bay.

After breakfast, the Veldcoronet returned to us with Mr. P. a farmer living at the entrance of the vale, at whose house he had taken up his night's lodging; and we set out, to make further inquiries into the nature of the soil, and other properties of the unoccupied land. Our horses were very lame, and stumbled grievously among the rushes and brushwood, through which we had to pass. We ascended the hill by a gulley, which appeared to us like the narrow bed of a water-course, but, by the report of the Veldcoronet, was made by wild boars. Part of the ascent has good land, some fit for corn, and some for pasture, but the flat summit, which stretches far away towards the sea, is unfruitful. We passed along the edge of the hill, the farmer describing every part of the vale in view, which he pronounced to be in many places fit for cultivation, especially for gardens and corn, the kloofs descending on the opposite side being well stored with wood, useful both for building and fuel. We now directed our course towards Mr. P.'s farm.

From an opposite kloof, a rivulet furnishes a constant supply of water, sufficient to irrigate his garden, and forming a natural division between the two properties. From the heights above the farm, there is a fine view of Plettenberg Bay, the western point of which is marked by a promontory and small island, the resort of a vast number of seals; and the eastern, by a high, conical hill, called the Grenadier's cap. Several lower peaks appear to rise at its foot. We noticed here a gigantic species of a plant, from its singular form, very properly called the chandelier. The specimen I obtained, had twenty shoots, proceeding, in a direction nearly horizontal, from its centre, each a foot long, with a beautiful scarlet flower at its point. Its root is a bulb. A smaller species is common all over the waste.

Having alighted, we walked to the house, along a gulley filled with fragments of a soft iron-stone, porous, and of various colours, brought off the hills by torrents. Some of it was flaky, full of larger or smaller cavities, filled with fine yellow ochre. Sand-stone and quartz lie, as usual, in abundance upon the surface of the ground.

Mr. P. and his old mother received us with civility, and set before us what their house afforded, tea-water, bread and butter, and preserved quinces of excellent flavour. The hills opposite the farm, are intersected by woody kloofs, and rendered picturesque by ledges of grey rock, with intermediate bushes. We were informed, that they swarm with apes and baboons, as likewise with tygers, wolves, and other wild animals; and though the latter seldom approach the dwellings, yet the cries of the poor antelopes and other game, seized and worried by them among the rocks and woods, are frequently heard below. Mr. P. walked with us into the garden, which is large and plentifully stocked with all kinds of fruits, apples, pears, peaches, quinces, oranges, and lemons, which he has some trouble to guard against the monkey tribes, infesting the neighbouring woods.

When we first met, Mr. P. seemed shy and cautious, made the worst of every thing relating to Jackal's Kraal, that we might consider it as unfit for a missionary station; but by degrees, he softened, and was ready to give every encouragement, hoping, that if a settlement was made, Hottentots would come into the country, and hands be obtained to assist in the farms. At present, the few Hot-tentot inhabitants are chiefly employed in cutting and preparing timber. Hitherto, Mr. P. has used the kraal for pasture-ground, as being an uninhabited spot, and as he would not wish to lose that convenience, he may be forgiven for viewing intruders with some suspicion. He showed his good sense and candour in so soon forsaking selfish views and prejudices. Men who have lived all their life-time in so sequestered a state, remote from society, consider, of course, their own affairs as of the first consequence, to which they have been accustomed to sacrifice every thing within their reach, not having discernment sufficient to judge of the relative importance of human concerns. Religion is generally quite out of the question, and its propagation considered as a secondary, if not wholly unnecessary business.

The Veldcornet accompanied us through the valley to our little camp. On our way, we observed much good land, fit for gardens and pasture. A vast quantity of palmite covers the banks of the rivulet, which is always considered as a sign of good and rich soil, but it is very difficult to eradicate, having a strong tap-root, running deep into the marshy ground. Brother Stein, who had walked forward, called to us to observe a large bird of prey he had driven off a carcase, which, on coming up, we found to be that of a young kid, just killed, and its entrails torn out. The bird was not much intimidated, for he alighted at a short distance, from whence he observed us undismayed, ready to return to his prey; and as we had neither the means, nor the right to prevent it, we left him to reap the benefit of his acquisition. Upon one of the bushy eminences to the right, I found the small aloe still in bloom, three weeks after they had left off showing any flowers at Groenekloof. After our return to the camp, Mr. Melville and I continued our ride into the kloof, which we had visited this morning, and as the sun was now at its height, the appearance of the wood, water, and rocks, was extremely beautiful.

Sister Schmitt meanwhile had not been idle, but after writing a letter, went with the Hottentots to the western side of the valley, and discovered, among the bushes, several pools of clear water, which she now advised us to visit. This was done, and we were convinced, that there is water sufficient for every purpose, and in every season, to serve a town of four or five hundred inhabitants.

We now took leave of Jackal's Kraal, with thanks to the landdrost, for having made us acquainted, both with Mr. Rex, and with a situation, not unworthy of consideration in the choice of a missionary settlement in this colony, notwithstanding the objections raised by our Hottentots, who ever prefer the rearing and tending of cattle, to labour in the field, and the rearing of crops.

CHAPTER IX.

Departure from Jackal's Kraal. View of Plettenberg Bay. Restless night. Passing over the Paardekop Mountain into the Lange Kloof. Wild Scenery. Dangerous road. Delay at Klip Revier. Receipt of letters from England. Enter the Lange Kloof, farms of Wellgelegen, Ungelegen, and Kliphuebel. Mr. Fereira's rencontre with a tyger.

OUR worthy friend, Mr. Rex, in proposing to detain us some days longer at his house, had informed us, that we might gain time, by not returning to Mr. Zaayman's, and going over the Duivel's kop into the Lange Kloof, but by crossing the mountains by the Paardekop, which, in a fine season, like the present, might be easily effected. We resolved, therefore, to take his advice, and proceed towards the Paardekop. After reaching the top of the western boundary of Jackal's Kraal, our road lay over a flat, dismal country, to the Veldcornet's house, seen through an opening between low hills. On the road, a slave, attempting to get on the box, without stopping the waggon, fell, and the fore-wheel passing over part of his leg, hurt him severely. Bukku brandy being repeatedly applied by Brother Stein, the pain was soon relieved, and inflammation prevented.

Mr. Melville had gone in quest of game, and shot two partridges, which, though in itself of not much importance, proved, under present circumstances, a most acceptable gift, our stock of fresh provisions being consumed. The Veldcornet's house is pleasantly situated at the meeting of three vallies, and notice being given of our arrival, we were kindly received, and treated with a well-dressed plain dinner. Mrs. Van Huysteyn afterwards presented Sister Schmitt with two cocks, a large square bottle of wild honey, and some other useful articles, and her husband accompanied us for some miles. His father, a venerable old Dutch gentleman, had been at Zeyst in Holland, and seemed pleased to see friends belonging to the same fraternity.

Having forded the Wittedrift, a brook running into the Kierbooms Revier, we began to ascend the heights, from which we had a full view of its course, and of Plettenberg Bay. The vessel, regularly employed to convey timber to the Cape, lay at anchor not far from the shore. The bay, however, being exposed to the south-east, from whence the wind generally blows with violence, makes it unsafe for any vessel to lie in it longer than necessity requires: otherwise, it affords great convenience to the inhabitants, to have communication with the Cape by water. The same advantage would likewise attend the possession of Jackal's Kraal.

While Mr. Melville was vainly following one of those cunning birds, the wild peacock, a bluebock, one of the smallest antelopes, started up, not far from the road. The Hottentots could not resist the temptation, but both our own people and the guides and drivers left the waggons, and, with two dogs, set off full speed in pursuit. As this animal is not as swift as others of the same kind, he may be run down in the open field by a swift-footed Hottentot; and now, but for his dexterous turnings and doublings, would have been taken, had he not reached a wood, and thus narrowly escaped. It was very amusing to us to see the chace, and the disappointed looks of the returning huntsmen. The fur of the bluebock is remarkably fine; brown, changing with a blueish grey. It was quite dark before we arrived at a farm, the possessor of which, after some hesitation, permitted us to pitch our tent and unyoke our oxen in the field before his house. We kindled a fire, and after a supper, consisting of coffee, bread and honey, lay down to rest. We were, however, prevented going to sleep, till near two o'clock in the morning, by a drunken Hottentot, whom neither the exhortations of Brother Schmitt, nor the more forcible means used by Brother Stein, who thrust him out of a Hottentot house, where, in quarrelling and fighting with a woman, he had bitten a piece out of her arm, could bring to reason.

24th. During the night, black clouds had over-spread the heavens, but providentially dispersed at sunrise, and the morning proved fine. Had it turned to rain, we durst not have ventured to proceed, and to encounter the passage across the mountains. The farmer seemed last night not much disposed to assist us; but Sister Schmitt had this morning got into favour both with him and his wife, and procured a supply of bread, milk, and cabbages. After breakfast we set out, and soon entered upon roads, not easily described, so as to give to Englishmen an adequate idea of them. How those African waggons can bear such thumping, bouncing, twisting, and screwing between rocks, and large masses of broken stones, irregularly piled upon each other, is almost beyond belief. But the Creator has mercifully provided for the wants of men in all countries. Here grows that valuable wood called Eysterhout, or ironwood, so hard, and likewise so tough, that an axle-tree made of it will bear more than an iron one of twice its thickness.

The views from the heights are most singular. I wish I were able to paint them, so as to present a true picture to my reader's imagination. Along the horizon to the east and south-east, runs the range of high mountains, enclosing the Lange Kloof, and exhibiting a rugged out-line, with many peaks. Before them are ranges of lower hills, of which, from one point, we counted no less than five, running parallel to each other, and intersected vertically by numberless kloofs, likewise in parallel lines, so as to give to the whole the appearance of division by art. These kloofs are partly naked, partly filled with bushes, or lined on each side with rocks. To the right of the road, the slope of the hill, sinking into a deep glen beneath, grew more and more steep, as we proceeded, and in some places to that degree, that we began to give credit to the stories of waggons and oxen rolling down altogether, and being seen no more. A misfortune of this kind is said to have happened to a waggon in General Dundas's retinue, when going over the Dui-vilskop.

In about two hours, we reached the Paerdekop (Horse's Head) mountain, over the very summit of which we had to pass. Its steepness in all directions renders it impossible to carry the road round its sides. Our exhausted oxen were hardly able to drag the waggons along, and we were obliged again to have recourse to a double spann. The sand-stone rock, forming the mass of the mountain, appears lying in strata nearly perpendicular, besides which, a vast number of large loose fragments are strewed upon its surface. Many of them are clothed with a lichen of a bright vermilion colour. Quartz lies in veins, or in detached pieces. The soil produces a variety of bushes, flowering shrubs and aloes, between the stones. With the help of our men, bearing the waggon up on either side; as the slope of the road required, and suffering our cattle to rest every two or three minutes, we at length surmounted every difficulty, and got safely across this dreaded mountain, to an out-spann place in a dreary wilderness. After an hour's rest, we set out again, and our groom, Leonhard, having pointed out a footpath, by which we might shorten our road, Brother and Sister Schmitt and I ventured upon it. It led us through a rocky glen, into which a stone, accidentally rolling down from the heights above, produced such a grand effect, that we amused ourselves for some time with great zeal, in repeating the experiment.

Meeting an old grey-headed Hottentot, with a long beard, dressed only in a kaross and skin apron, we entered into conversation with him. I presented him with a few doppelgens (penny pieces). He thanked me, and observed, that of all things in the world he loved money best. Brother Schmitt asked him, whether he did not love God better, to which he replied, that he knew nothing of him. This gave the missionary an opportunity of declaring to him the love of God to man, and to direct the poor old man to Jesus, who had loved him unto death, and deserved to be loved above every thing in earth and heaven. The Hottentot listened with attention and surprise, and promised to think on that which he had now heard, and pray to God to give him grace to understand it.

After a tedious and troublesome walk, we arrived at a kraal, near a valley, where an aged Hottentot lived, with two slaves. The kraal consisted of a circular building of reeds and rushes, covered with grass, a garden near the brook, and a small enclosure for cattle. Two shaggy dogs announced our arrival with loud barking, which brought out the old man, accompanied, to our comfort, by Leonhard, who had reached the place before us, and turned our horses into the field to graze. The man seemed much pleased with our visit, and not well fitted for a hermit. On leaving him, we descended into the valley, crossed the brook, and mounted a steep hill, from which, in a short time, we discovered our waggons coming down the woody glen. They followed us up the hill, which proved one of the longest ascents, and heaviest roads in the whole journey. Here I found the first chrystals of quartz, diminutive indeed, but clear, in veins and fissures of sand-stone, and, in general, more disposition to chrystallization in the quartz, than I had ever met with before in this country. Had we foot-passengers not got so far forward up the hill, before the waggons arrived at the bottom, it was the boor's intention to have spent the night in the valley.

After gaining the summit, we passed through a barren heath, and arrived long after sunset, at a place called Kloetes Kraal. Here was neither house, nor Hottentot's hut; but some pieces of timber, the remnants of an old habitation, lying on the ground, enabled us to kindle two large fires. I had been troubled with headach during the latter part of our journey, and as soon as my matrass could be got ready, lay down in the waggon to rest. While supper was cooking, which for some days was our only meal, Sister Schmitt, knowing that I generally find relief in strong coffee, but should have refused giving her additional trouble, prepared it unobserved, and unexpectedly brought me a basin of it into the tent, before I ascended into my dormitory. Services so generous, and unasked for, deserve to be recorded with gratitude; nor is this the first time, that I have experienced the exquisite delight of indulging a grateful sense of the disinterested and unsolicited services of my South African brethren and friends, whose unmerited kindness towards me on every occasion, will ever remain deeply impressed upon my heart.

The situation of our encampment was dreary in the extreme, high and bleak, surrounded with low eminences, which shut out the view of the mountains, not a tree in sight, and far distant from the dwellings of men. During the night, which was very dark, I was roused from sleep, by perceiving some odd motion of the waggon. I sat up, and for a moment felt afraid, that some wild beast had approached our camp, when one of the wheels seemed fairly lifted off the ground by some external force. Being so closely shut in, that I could not discover the cause, I called to the Hottentots, who were sleeping round the fire, to come to my assistance, and my shouts alarmed the whole party. It was soon found, that the innocent author of this disturbance was one of our horses, who, having returned from the place, where he had been sent to feed, was amusing himself by scrubbing his back against the wheel. He was, of course, driven away, but soon returned to my great annoyance, till my patience being exhausted, I got up, and sent him off to some distance. Notwithstanding my rest had been thus broken, when the morning dawned, I rose with the rest of the company, in perfect health.

We now found that our sociable friend from the round kraal had followed the waggon, and arrived with our Hottentots, after we had retired to rest. He had thus gained a good deal of amusement, and, we hope, some useful information and instruction, besides partaking of their supper and breakfast. We were at least six miles from his hermitage, and our arrival was to him, no doubt, an event of much importance.

25th. The boor, who brought us thus far, had behaved with so much reserve, and had such a forbidding countenance, that we had set him down for a very sulky fellow; but we now found ourselves so much at his mercy in this wilderness, where we might have waited long enough for a relay of oxen, that we resolved to try his temper, and whether he had good nature enough left, to agree to put us forward another "skoff" or day's journey. Brother Schmitt conducted the negotiation, and having represented our case, found him much more pliable than expected; and surely one ought not always to judge of a man's heart by the cut of his face. After some silent consultation with his own feelings, he observed, that he could not be satisfied, to leave us in this desert, but though his oxen were tired, he would bring us to Klip Revier, on Kierbooms Revier, being the first farm in the Lange Kloof. For this exertion of good-will, he was treated with coffee and brandy, and at the end of the journey, with a good meal, and a Gnaden-thal knife.

We set out after breakfast, and walked along a steep, broken ridge of barren hills, while the waggon took the road lower down. Wild boars having been seen this morning on a neighbouring hill, Marcus was sent with a rifle gun to try to get some venison, but returned without having discovered their retreat. In fact, we could not spare any of our people, as every assistance was wanted to keep the waggon from oversetting. We had now arrived among kloofs and low hills, each of which, however, would have obtained the name of mountain in the midland counties of England. They are uniformly very steep, and the ravines dividing them, full of huge stones, rocks, and bushes. One must see such a wild and truly horrid region as we passed through, to have any conception of it. It is in vain to attempt to describe it. The weather had appeared very unpromising in the morning, but cleared up, though the sun did not break forth till late in the day, which kept us and our cattle cool. We were indeed highly favoured in venturing to make the passage over the Paerdekop into the Lange Kloof. Had it rained, we might have been detained among the mountains many days, as is the fate of many a traveller. The people belonging to a waggon we met on the road, informed us that they had been three days on the journey, and had the misfortune twice to overset.

After a tedious, difficult, and I may say, dangerous passage over many a hill and glen, we made one hour's out-span in a deep valley enclosed on all sides by steep banks, and got a luncheon of bread and honey. Brother Stein mounted a rock, unobserved, and played on his flute the tune of that hymn, "Now let us praise the Lord," while we all felt disposed to join with heart and voices; for we had indeed cause to praise the Lord for bringing us thus far in safety. Our musician afterwards regaled the English ears among us, with "God save great George our King", which we may venture to say has never yet been heard in this part of his Majesty's dominions. I remained in the waggon, writing my journal.

After our refreshment, we entered with renewed courage, upon our toilsome journey, of which, indeed, the poor oxen had more cause to complain, than we. Sixteen drew the heavy, and twelve the light waggon. We had our full complement of drivers and leaders, who with our own Hottentots found sufficient employ. Let no one ever hereafter complain of the passage of Hottentot-Holland's Kloof, or the Haue Hoek near Gnadenthal, who has passed over these roads, or rather plunged up and down these precipices. Barren as these mountains in general appear, they yet afford a rich harvest for the botanist, and we found several curious plants, unknown to our best botanist, Mr. Melville. In some places, the rugged sides of the hills are clothed with aloes, and other larger plants, and as we proceeded, we saw, on many hills, the so-called Wageboom growing dispersed, resembling a planted orchard, the trees standing fifteen or twenty paces asunder. Of wild creatures, we saw only a few rehbock antelopes, but being excessively shy, our huntsmen Schmitt and Melville rode or ran after them in vain. Elephants, wild boars, wolves, and tygers, as likewise baboons, haunt these desolate regions, the first however, only where they find wood and water.

One of our young drivers related to his companion, that at the round kraal, which we visited yesterday, he watched a tyger for several nights successively, climbing up the poles of the hen-roost. This is a platform made of branches of trees covered with bushes or grass, supported by four or more uprights, about ten or twelve feet high, to which the cocks and hens fly, about sunset, and there roost during the night, out of the reach of mausehunde, foxes, and other destructive animals. Nor can tygers, or wild cats, well scramble up a smooth pole, with an overhanging superstructure. The tyger had succeeded in siezing one or two chickens, near the edge of the roost, and the Hottentot was determined to stop his thieving. He made two small holes in the side of the kraal, one for the muzzle of his gun, the other for his eye, behind which he lay in ambush. The tyger soon came, and clasping one of the poles with his claws, seemed contriving how best to mount to the platform. At that moment the lad fired, and the animal fell, but uttered so loud a roar, that, thinking him yet alive, and likely in his fury, to make an attack upon the kraal, he first let out his dog. The dog soon put an end to the tyger's life, as he had received the shot through his body.

About five o'clock, we arrived at Klip Revier, and were welcomed by a friendly farmer of the name of Barkhuis, but who had it not in his power to put us forward to-day. We therefore sent a message to the Veldcornet, to have oxen ready for us to-morrow at the next station. Thither our host proposed to bring us, but not before noon. As the orders of the landdrost to the Veldcornets were given, under the supposition, that we should cross the mountains by Mr. Zaayman's, and over the Duivelskop, it was our own fault, that we did not meet with relays on this road. We thus lost more in time, than we gained in distance. Having pitched our tent in the field near the house, and given our host a good supper, we enjoyed a comfortable night's rest.

26th. We breakfasted in the house with the family, and had the pleasure of treating them with a dish of genuine and well-made coffee. They are poor, and have many children, whom they find it difficult to maintain. Wherever we found this to be the case, far from wishing to lessen their stock of provisions, by our requisitions, we gave them what we could afford, out of the supplies we had brought with us, or purchased from richer boors. But though they were poor, Mr and Mrs. Barkhuis treated us in return; and sweeter grapes and richer milk, we had nowhere tasted, since we left Gnadenthal. Some friends of our host were here, and dined with us. Their conversation turned upon that never-failing subject of complaint against the English Government, the new taxes, and the measuring and valuing of the lands.

About two o'clock, we left Klip Revier, and set out for Kierbooms Revier, belonging to the mother of our host, where we expected to procure relays. The road was very uneven, in many places steep and rocky, and having our host's son, a huge lad of seventeen, for our driver, his giddiness and inattention caused us considerable alarm. In about three hours, we arrived at the above-mentioned place, where we not only found no oxen, but no tidings of the result of our message to the Veldcornet. Here, therefore, we were again detained, with a family apparently not well pleased with our visit. An old lady, of extraordinary bulk, and determined countenance, occupied one corner of the room, and not a smile or inviting word bid us welcome. After staring some time at one another, the usual laconic address was uttered; "Sit" was the word, and we sat down. "Tea-water" was next offered, and we heard afterwards that we were expected to sup with the family, but no invitation being given, we thought best to bid them good night, and retreat into our tent.

27th. We were amused this morning by all manner of contradictory accounts, given by a half-drunken dragoon, as to his having seen a packet of letters from England at the Veldcornet's house, addressed to me. It seemed almost incredible, but, to my very great satisfaction, proved a true tale, for the packet was delivered to me in the afternoon by a dragoon. It contained letters from my family of November, and December, and from friends in London; and had been forwarded to me by the kindness of Mr. Van Kervel. The receipt of this welcome present, in this dreary region, contributed much to lessen the regret we felt at meeting again with so unpleasant a detention. We had sent a boy on horseback to the Veldcornet, to obtain information respecting the relays, in consequence of which, that gentleman arrived in the afternoon. He had provided the necessary relays, but having ordered them, some days ago, on the road towards the Duivelskop, they were now countermanded, and directed hither. Meanwhile Sister Schmitt had got into favour with the old lady and her daughters, who now insisted upon taking our meals with them. Mr. Melville and I were employed during the day in drawing and writing, and some of us took a walk into the rocky glen, out of which the Kierbooms Revier flows, in a deep bottom. The rocks on each side appear in strata of considerable breadth, with bushes interspersed. They are of sand-stone, coloured by iron, with much quartz. But the most remarkable feature of the country, are the hills to the eastward, exhibiting, as it were, a huge bank, with an even ridge, divided downwards in parallel lines, by narrow kloofs. At the bottom of each kloof lies a round hillock, formed, to all appearance, by earth and stones washed down out of the kloof. This singular formation of whole ranges of hills in this part of Africa, is a geological phenomenon, perhaps more easily explained than some others; but what with their barrenness and their regularity, they are unpleasant objects to the eye of a lover of the picturesque.

In the evening, Mrs. Barkhuis proposed that Brother Schmitt should deliver a discourse to the family, the Hottentots and slaves in her service being admitted. This was done; about thirty persons were present, and we hope that the Lord, who has promised, that His "word shall not return void, but accomplish the thing whereunto it is sent," will have caused some of the seed sown, to have fallen into ground prepared by His Spirit to receive it, so as to bring forth fruit. The Hottentots and slaves were particularly attentive, and expressed afterwards their thanks to Brother Schmitt, and their earnest wish, that, in this neighbourhood, a settlement might be formed, where they might hear the word of God. From our own Hottentots they heard much of Gnadenthal, and of the benefits enjoyed by their countrymen living in our settlements, and, no doubt, profited by the unadorned and simple account given them of the way of salvation by faith in Jesus.

28th. Being now in high favour with the old lady, she invited us to an early breakfast, after which we set out, passing over rough roads, into the narrower part of the Lange Kloof, properly so called, being a vale of perhaps a hundred miles in length, enclosed by mountains of different heights. On entering upon it, we felt not a little disappointed. We were no longer amused with a magnificent show of peaks, table-mountains, or round tops in succession, but saw a long ridge of comparatively low hills, divided, as above described, by narrow, parallel kloofs, without wood or water, skirting a dull, uncultivated vale. On one of the hills we descried a company of baboons. They first seemed to wait our approach, but soon retreated in haste towards the summit. In vain we looked for the rich country and pleasant farms described by some travellers, and after passing some mean-looking houses, halted on the waste.

In the afternoon, we arrived at a farm called Welgelegen, where we were received with civility, and got a fresh relay of oxen. The region of sand-stone, iron, and quartz, continued, but the country began to look better, and some beautiful groups of high mountains were seen, in different directions. It was dark before we reached another farm called Ungelegen, where not having any choice, we pitched our tent, by the faint light of some fires on the neighbouring hills, on the werft or yard, which was little better than a dung-hill. Before we lay down to rest, it began to lighten and thunder, and during the night, some squalls, with showers, disturbed our rest.

29th. We were glad, when the day dawned, to quit this 'unclean spot. The clouds were still hovering on the mountains, but we found ourselves in a more interesting country, and every now and then a charming prospect opened. After about an hour's ride, we saw waggons and horsemen coming to meet us. They were a transport of Hottentot soldiers with some dragoons, returning from the interior. Among the former, two or three belonged to our people, and had some conversation with Brother Schmitt. The officers followed in a horse-waggon.

This forenoon Mr. Melville found some employment for his gun, but owing to a dog, belonging to the driver, who had followed the waggons, could not succeed. This animal, as soon as he saw any game, made off full speed towards them. Thus, they could never be brought within shot.

Soon after parting with the military, we met the Veldcornet, Stephen Ferreira, and his son on horseback, following the soldiers. He informed us that relays were provided at his farm, Kliphübel, where we arrived about noon, but did not meet with a very gracious reception. No notice was taken of us, and Mrs. Ferreira suffered Sister Schmitt to go about seeking water and milk for breakfast, wherever she could find it, without offering her the least assistance. The wind was very cold, and we endeavoured to screen ourselves behind the stump of an old tree; in the middle of the yard. At length our hostess relented, and sent word, that we might come and take our tea in the house.

She even set before us a dish of excellent rehböck-venison. Her son, an intelligent young man, with whom I had much conversation after dinner, gave me an interesting account his father's history. The Fereira's are of Portuguese origin. His great grandfather (or one above him, I forget which) was the only person saved from a Portuguese ship, which foundered at sea, off the Cape. He got upon a plank, which supported him for three days, and rowing with his hands in a direction, in which he expected to find land, by God's mercy, he succeeded, and reached the Cape shore, though nearly exhausted, and perishing with hunger. Here, by industry, he and his successors raised themselves into creditable situations. Of his father, a singular instance of courage and good fortune is told. A large tyger, having long infested his premises and the neighbourhood, and killed many sheep, belonging to him and other boors; a party assembled to endeavour to destroy the monster. His haunt being discovered, Mr. Fereira was foremost in the attack, when the tyger instantly made a spring at him, as he sat on horseback, the rest of the party not having come up, and only one slave being with him. The horse taking fright, ran off with his rider, who was but slightly wounded. The tyger was meanwhile attacked by all the dogs, and a furious contest ensued. Mr. Fereira, not intimidated, as soon as he could again command his horse, returned to the charge, and encouraged the dogs by the usual cry of Zaza, Zaza. The enraged animal, hearing this cry, quitted the dogs, and flew a second time at Mr. Fereira's head, when with one gripe he tore off his scalp, and threw him upon the ground, where he was proceeding, with teeth and claws, to put an end to his existence. The faithful slave, seeing his master in such imminent danger, ran to his assistance, and attempted to stab the tyger with a knife. The infuriated beast, however, was too quick for him, seized his hand with his teeth, and flung him upon his master, doing his best to kill them both, which, by his strength and swiftness of motion, he probably would have accomplished, had not the other huntsmen, coming up, shot him through the heart, and thus delivered the sufferers. Though Mr. Fereira was dreadfully hurt, and his life for some time despaired of, he completely recovered.

CHAPTER X.

Wagebooms Revier. Oversetting of the baggage-waggon. Brother Stein much hurt. Difficulty of procuring oxen. Ellandsfonteyn. Kromm Revier. Jagersbosch. Account of a young tyger killed. Objections to a settlement near a high-road. Farms deserted on account of taxation. Description of an encampment at Essenbosch. Account of the appearance and dwelling of the lady of the manor. Soekow. Ungracious reception at a Veldcorne's house. His apology. Remarks on the fruits of conversion to Christianity, Winterhoeke mountains.

AT one o'clock, we left Kliphübel. Our road lay along the Wagebooms Revier, which takes its name from the quantity of Wageboom, loosely covering the hills on each side. About sunset, we arrived at a farm, bearing the same name, and had some thoughts of taking up our abode here for the night; but hearing that the roads were good, and being impatient to proceed, we went forward, and arrived at another farm, called Oliviers, intending, if possible, to reach the place of a Mr. Mey, on Kromm Revier, where we expected to find a relay of oxen ready for us. Having crossed a large brook with a rough bottom of loose stones, we found the road sandy, and easy, and though the night was very dark, we pleased ourselves with the thoughts of being no longer among rocks and precipices, in constant danger of over-setting.

The weather in the afternoon had turned out rather unfavourable, and we expected a rainy, windy night, yet every now and then, the stars appeared, and while we were amused by a sudden flash of light, not much inferior in brightness to what is called white lightning, occasioned by a shooting star, all on a sudden, a crash was heard, and the baggage-waggon being foremost, and conspicuous by its white covering, vanished out of sight. The careless leader, a Hottentot lad, had suffered the oxen to turn upon the grassy bank, which on each side, by degrees, rose to the height of two feet above the level of the road. On turning in again, both wheels slipping of the edge of the bank at once, the waggon immediately overset, and fell into the hollow, with its top downwards. Brother Stein was lying in it, fast asleep. We instantly quitted our waggon to come to his assistance. To our great sorrow, we found him much hurt, both in his head and right arm, particularly in the latter. He felt faint, and stunned with the blow. Our first business, therefore, was to do all in our power to afford him relief. The oxen were unyoked, the tent set up, and a fire kindled with some bushes, which our Hottentots, contrary to their usual custom, had gathered, and tied behind the waggon. It was well, that, for once, they had been so provident, for the place, where the overthrow happened, was quite destitute of bushes or any kind of fuel.

The night was so dark, that we could not see far around us, but only perceived, that we were in a valley between low, barren eminences, with a flat top. With a view to discover whether there were any bushes in the neighbourhood, we set the dry grass and rushes on fire. The fire ran along so fast, that I began to be apprehensive, that in case we were near any dwellings, or Hottentot huts, mischief might ensue, and with much trouble we extinguished it again, but not before it had afforded light sufficient to examine the damage done, and to see Brother Stein comfortably housed and put to bed in the tent. He bore his misfortune with uncommon fortitude and resignation, never uttering a single complaint against the careless Hottentot leaders and drivers, who had been the cause of it. He was not able to lift his arm, but did not think that it was fractured, and, as none of us possessed the least skill in surgical affairs, we were obliged to leave him to apply what he thought best. The bottle of bukku brandy was not broken, and this was the only medicine he used, from first to last.

We now began to examine the waggon, when, to our great joy, we found, that it had not received the slightest injury by the fall. That part of the hollow road, into which it had fallen, was full of fine sand, soft and yielding, whereas, if it had overset about half a dozen paces sooner, or as many farther forward, it would have fallen upon a bare rock, and probably been greatly damaged. The mischief done to the contents of the waggon, was likewise not so great, as might have been expected. A few cups, saucers, and plates, were broken, but we regretted most of all the total loss of our stock of wild honey, both jars being thrown out of the waggon-chest, and dashed to pieces, and all their sweet contents spilt in the sand. After emptying the waggon, and setting all hands to work, we lifted it up, drew it forward upon even ground, and packed it again. Providentially, we were favoured with better weather. Brother Stein, after the pain in his head and arm had somewhat abated, regained his usual cheerfulness, expressed thankfulness to the Lord that it was no worse, and perfect resignation to this dispensation, which he was assured was meant for good, and only regretted, that he should be for a season prevented from rendering us any assistance. He even retained his appetite, and as we were supplied with a good supper by our faithful caterer, he ate heartily of it.

Each having contributed as much as was in his power to set matters again in order, when we met together in the tent, we could not but reflect on the situation into which we were unexpectedly thrown. While exposed to dangers among frightful precipices and rocks, in the mountains and defiles, through which we had passed, we had met with no accident whatever; but here, when we thought ourselves perfectly safe, and on level ground, we were suddenly brought into trouble, by this unlooked-for event. We were humbled under the mighty, but merciful hand of our God and Saviour, and commended ourselves anew to His protection, of which, even now, we have experienced a singular proof, in the manner in which we met with this accident, as above stated. One of the company observed, that in every dispensation, with which the Lord visits His people, there is a voice, a word of admonition, reproof, or encouragement, and it would be right and profitable, on the present occasion, for each of us to be attentive to it; for if we are His sheep, we shall be taught to know His voice, and well to distinguish it from the voice of a stranger.

During the night, not being disposed to sleep, I thought much on our situation, uncertain what injury Brother Stein might have received, and whether, perhaps, our progress might not be interrupted, if not our plans frustrated, by this circumstance. Whenever I perceived him stirring on his mattress, I asked softly, how he felt, and always received that comforting answer, that he did not think, that his arm was broken. He begged no alteration in our plan might be made on his account, and expressed his trust in God, that no further harm was done, than that he was for a time disabled, and we should miss his assistance on the journey. Meanwhile we all waited anxiously for the morning, and considered it as very providential, that it did not rain. Rain would have rendered our situation much more inconvenient and distressing, and the small stock of fuel we had brought with us, served us and our people no longer than was necessary to cook some victuals.

30th. The morning's dawn showed us the surrounding country: a dreary waste, a valley without water, enclosed between barren hills. The same careless fellow, who had been the immediate cause of all the mischief, had left the oxen to stray so far from the waggon, that all search for them seemed to be vain. In about three hours, Jeremias discovered and brought them back. Meanwhile,

Brother Schmitt and Marcus had walked on to Mr. Mey's farm, on Kromm Revier, where we had intended to spend the night, to announce our arrival, and procure the relays. Lebrecht Aris was gone forward in another direction, to order a second spann. The Hottentots belonging to the relays, were wandering about, on a vain search for the strayed cattle, and we were left alone with Johannes and Jeremias. We were therefore all obliged to assist in yoking the oxen, some of which did not seem to have much respect for their new masters, but ran about, or showed a threatening pair of horns. At length they were subdued, and having made up a bed in the baggage-waggon for our wounded companion, we proceeded, and reached the hill above Mr. Mey's farm. On inquiry, we heard that Brother Schmitt had sent Marcus forward to a farmer of the same name for a relay, and was himself gone to Ellandsfonteyn, a place belonging to Mr. Piet Ferreira. Sister Schmitt and I followed him, while Mr. Melville staid with the waggons. We met him returning, and though he had got no oxen, he was well-pleased with his visit. The farmer's wife was anxiously concerned for the salvation of her soul, and very eager to hear from him, in what way she might find rest. He showed her, from the scriptures, that she could not obtain it, but by coming to Jesus, according to His own gracious invitation, given to "all that labour and are heavily laden." She seemed to derive comfort from his encouraging address. He recommended to her to read the bible, with prayer, that the Spirit of Truth might explain to her soul the word of the Cross, which is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." He had also met with a man from the Chamtoos Revier, who gave him much useful information about that country, and of its occupation by many new settlers. A Hottentot from Gnadenthal had already made our errand known among the farmers. One of them, on a visit to Mr. Piet Ferreira, informed Brother Schmitt, that he had a place exactly suited to our purpose, which he wished to dispose of, and would have him immediately come to see and judge for himself. Brother Schmitt promised, that if we discovered nothing to suit us in Uitenhagen district, we would, on our return, call and look at his place.

As we could not procure the oxen we wanted, we proceeded with those we had brought with us, to a valley, whither Mr. Marcus had ordered two spans to meet us. Here we turned the former adrift, leaving them to find their way home, which they are sure to do, though no driver be with them. We were very thankful to Mr. Marcus for his civility, especially as he had at first declared, that he would not furnish any oxen, except by command of his own Veldcornet.

Our road lay through a narrow vale, with the Kromm Revier running in a deep bottom. This river rises in a barren glen, above Mr. Mey's farm, and must be often forded, as it winds from side to side, and truly deserves the appellation, of the Kromm, or crooked river.

Our next station was Jagersbosch, a farm belonging to a German of the name of Akkerman, who received us very civilly, and promised to send us forward in the morning. A tyger had just been killed by one of his Hottentots, and two dragoons were helping him to skin the animal, the carcase being still warm. It was a beautiful young creature. The manner in which it was killed deserves notice. The Hottentot having discovered his haunt, went out with ten dogs, but without any other weapon than a club. As soon as the animal perceived the dogs advancing, he fixed his fiery eyes upon the man, and flew towards him. The Hottentot presented his kaross as a shield, and succeeded in warding off the stroke and throwing the tyger upon his back, when the dogs, instantly falling upon him, kept him down, till the Hottentot had an opportunity of hitting him some severe blows on the head with his club, by which he was stunned, and then stoned to death. The skin was not injured, and I promised the conqueror to purchase it on my return, if I found it well tanned.

Our tent being pitched near the river, we spent a quiet night. Brother Stein complained of more pain in his arm, but continued to apply bukku brandy to the part injured.

31st. After breakfast, Brother Schmitt and I walked up to the farm-house, and took a view of the premises. The poor farmer was so much alarmed at the expense of measurement and taxation, that he offered to dispose of his place at the low price of twelve hundred rix-dollars. It has many advantages, and water in abundance, brought by a slote, or canal, from a considerable distance, and lying so high, that all the grounds may be irrigated with ease, and a mill supplied by it. The house was in ruins, and one miserable room contained the whole family. In the grounds stood a remarkably large, wide-spreading oak, bamboos of very stately growth, and a great number of orange, lemon, peach, and other fruit-trees, but all neglected, and going to decay. In former days, the place was kept in good order, avenues of trees and hedges still remaining. The lands, belonging to the farm, extend for a considerable way, both up and down the river, and appeared to us well adapted for the growth both of corn and grass. But there is an objection to this place for a missionary station, which, in our view, was an insuperable one. It lies on the high road; the inhabitant is continually annoyed by calls, and put to great expense by entertaining all travellers without exception, and though African hospitality is by no means what some have described it to be, but the traveller is often turned out, and sometimes prefers to encamp upon the werft, or in the field, yet every one thinks himself at liberty to enter any house on the road, and sit down to talk.

The time, before Mr. Akkerman's oxen arrived from the hills, was spent in various useful employments, till about ten o'clock; when we set off, keeping for many miles along the banks of the Kromm Revier, in a narrow vale, in which, now and then, we met with some picturesque scenery. We passed two farms, deserted, as we were informed, by the possessors, on account of their inability to pay for measurement and taxation.

At three in the afternoon, we reached Essenbosch, and the weather having become unpleasant, with much wind, and threatening rain, we ordered the drivers to pass the farm-house, and descend into a woody glen, through which ran a clear brook, falling in small cascades down the rocky declivity, and altogether appearing a romantic retreat. The place first chosen for our tent being much exposed to the wind, we found another, more sheltered, and, as the oxen had been some time unyoked, and were gone away, we performed, in their place, the service of drawing the waggons to it.

Our tent was now pitched on a grassy spot, surrounded with bushes, and defended by high trees against the wind, which had risen to a pretty heavy gale. It blew and rained all night, but having reached this snug sheltering-place, before the rain began, we did not suffer much by it.

After dinner, as Sister Schmitt was going to fetch something from the waggon, she was alarmed by the sight of an animal, in appearance as large as a mastiff, running out of one thicket into another, the light of the fire showing his shape pretty distinctly. Though she was laughed at for her fears, we all felt some degree of alarm, and rekindled our two fires, for we were in a region, where wild beasts were said to abound, and where cover enough was to be found for them among the rocks and bushes.

During the night, I awoke, and heard distinctly an unknown noise, seemingly not far from the tent, resembling both the growl of an angry cat, and the low bleating of a calf. Perceiving Brother Schmitt to be awake, I asked softly, "Do you hear that?" "Aye," said he, "I have been listening to it for some time: no good comes out of that throat!" In the morning, the Hottentots, who had likewise heard it, pronounced it to have been the roar of a tyger, probably of the creature, seen by Sister Schmitt.

April 1st. To our great joy, all the clouds had fled, together with the wind, and the sun shone bright. We now first saw and were delighted with the snugness of our encampment, and the beautiful prospect towards the west. A very high peaked mountain, of a conical form, which we had yesterday noticed, though obscured by the rain, appeared now to great advantage, overtopping all the other hills. It looked like a huge vulcano. Under it lay three ridges of subordinate hills, of various shapes, one rising above the other. The wood, with our tent, waggons, and fires, formed the fore-ground, and the whole was worthy of the pencil of a Nicholson. Both Mr. Melville and I endeavoured to obtain an exact sketch of this charming landscape.

As to our departure, we remained some time in unpleasant uncertainty. One spann had been ordered at Essenbosch, and the other from a Mr. Miller at Soekow, who was to fetch us from Jagersbosch. We feared, therefore, that the latter might have passed by, during the night.

Meanwhile Sister Schmitt reported, that on going to procure some milk from the farmer's wife, living on the hill eastward of our camp, she had found her to be a woman of uncommon size, occupying a huge arm chair, above a yard wide, out of which she was scarcely able to lift herself. She had expressed a wish to see the whole of our party, and certainly, though she herself would excite as much curiosity in England, as the famous Lambert, she had a right to consider us, as Englishmen, equally worthy of attention in Africa. Otherwise, being perfectly content with things of ordinary size and appearance, I should not have gone a step out of my way to see a monster. But being so kindly invited, we went in a body to pay the lady a morning-visit, at her own house, if the hovel she inhabited, may be dignified by that name. It consisted of an oblong square, enclosed in a wall of unburnt bricks, one half of which was covered with a roof of rushes. The entrance was through the uncovered part. In this vestibule three or four naked slave-children were crawling about; a woman, partially clothed in rags, with a child strapped to her breast, was cooking some victuals at a fire, and dirt, guts, old shoes, rags of sheep-skins, and other filth, occupied every part of the premises, out and inside. On entering the main apartment, the first thing that met the eye, was the carcase of a sheep just killed, hanging from a cross-beam with a pool of blood on the clay floor, under the head; five fox-coloured cats were sitting round, watching for their share of the spoil: a milk-pail, churn, and some other kitchen utensils to the right; and to the left, the lady herself, who kindly invited Sister Schmitt to come and sit down on a stool, between her and the pendant carcase. Her husband, a very civil, old man, with a grey beard, and a large straw hat, sat at the table, and a bench was placed for us, between the carcase and the door. The lady herself entered freely into conversation, told us, that notwithstanding her enormous bulk, she was only forty-three years old, and good-humouredly observed, that Sister Schmitt looked now only like a little girl, passing several jokes on the difference between them. Her face still retained some vivacity and comeliness. Her body entirely filled the vast chair she sat in, on the arms of which her elbows rested. She intended soon to remove to another habitation on Serjcants Revier. When once hoisted into the waggon, she can no more quit it, till she arrives at the place of her destination. From her wooden throne, she issued her commands to her slaves, Hottentots, and brutes, with the same shrill voice, for which the African ladies are noted. Close to the dwelling, was the beast-kraal, and the surrounding premises exhibited a congeries of lumber, rags, ruin, and disorder, not to be described. Through all this chaos, ran a small stream of spring-water, clear as chrystal, in vain offering its aid to cleanse the Augean stable. The lady, however, conscious of mortality, had already provided herself with a coffin of immense size, which, with her gigantic bed, is screened off the apartment by a bulk-head of matting.

The old gentleman walked with us to our encampment, and not only gave good advice, but agreed with Mr. Akkerman who had followed us, that he should put us forward with his oxen as far as Soekow, for which we felt much obliged to him. The latter wishing to sell us a spann, Brother Schmitt entered into some negotiation with him, ending in a reference to a determination on our return. At half past nine, we left this romantic outspann-place, and passed through an uninteresting country, till, about one o'clock, we arrived at Mr. Miller's farm. We here procured sweet milk and good bread. Some dragoons seemed pleased to meet with their countrymen, and Mr. Akkerman, with the old farmer from Essensbosch, had preceded us on horseback. Relays being soon provided, we set out for the Veldcoronet's, hoping to reach his place before dark. The road, however, was bad, and we got on but slowly. Several antelopes were seen, but their swiftness saved them, nor had we dogs used to the chase. On the road we met a serjeant of dragoons with a private. The former had been at Groenekloof, and was acquainted with the missionaries, with whom he entered into conversation, and seemed quite in a kind of ecstasy, speaking of the religious disposition of all classes of people about Uitenhagen. He was sent to call off all the dragoons stationed on the road, as that mode of conveying dispatches is rendered unnecessary, by the conclusion of the war with the rebellious boors.

When we arrived at the Veldcoronet's, we found him very much out of humour. Mr. Melville, who first entered the house to announce us, met with a very ungracious reception, though we had sent Leonhard Paerl to him with the landdrost's order for relays. In his absence, his wife had ordered them, but he pretended ignorance, and rudely asked, "Who are you? What is your business at Uitenhagen?" with other questions equally impertinent. Mr. Melville replied, that we should inform the landdrost of our business, when we reached the drosty, and meanwhile required him to furnish us with the means of proceeding. When the rest of us followed, he began to use language which soon convinced us, that we should be much happier in our tent, than under his roof. We therefore took leave, pitched the tent on the werft, and kindled a fire. Sister Schmitt had previously mentioned to the lady, that we should be glad to purchase a sheep, but we now doubted, whether we should obtain one. Her husband, however, unknown to us, ordered two slaves to bring a sheep to the waggons. They did so, cut its throat, and left it to bleed, without informing either us or our Hottentots, who accidentally found it weltering in its blood. This extraordinary conduct gave us no favourable opinion of the character of our ungracious host.

2d. About four in the morning, I heard a noise in the tent, and thinking that Mr. Melville's dog, Rambler, who always slept there, was seeking something to eat among the plates, sat up and called to him, when a large black dog passed close by me, and ran out. He had devoured the candle, emptied the butter pot, containing about two pounds of butter, and would have made a better breakfast, had he not been disturbed. When I left the tent at day-break, I saw the Veldcornet and another person standing on the werft. Mr. Melville accompanied me to him, to inquire, when we might hope to be forwarded on our journey. To our surprise, we found him disposed to be more civil, and he informed us, that we might expect oxen by eight o'clock. As he seemed open to remonstrance, we inquired the cause of his marked rough treatment of us yesterday evening. He made an apology, by explaining, how he was continually harassed by orders for Vorspann, caring for the transport of the military and their baggage, and put to the inconvenience of sending his men up and down the country, instead of doing work in his own farm, by which he sustained more injury, than any exemption from taxation could possibly repair, and was prevented from erecting necessary buildings, and putting his place into better order. He appealed to a dragoon, who stood by, and added, that his patience and temper were so much tried, and himself fatigued by continual calls, and riding about to secure the oxen ordered, that it was no wonder, that he could not contain himself. His apology was gladly admitted, Mr. Melville only observing, that his complaints might have been made in a more gentlemanly way, and without using insulting language. Our quarrel was then made up, and he entered into friendly conversation with Brother Schmitt.

His wife, whom we had found to be a very civil and obliging woman, seemed quite to revive, on seeing the reconciliation take place, having been truly distressed by her husband's strange conduct yesterday.

The Veldcornet expressed his admiration of the appearance and behaviour of our Hottentots, exhibiting, as he said, such a contrast to that of the miserable and neglected race of Hottentots, living among the boors. Nothing was more encouraging and satisfactory to us, than such remarks, nor is there a more convincing proof of the benefit conferred upon this nation, by the introduction of Christianity. It shows the necessity of obtaining more opportunities for planting missions among them, in which Christian instruction and civilization go hand in hand.

In this part of the country, more than about Gnadenthal and Groenekloof, one may behold the state of degradation, into which the Hottentot nation has sunk, the blame and shame of which lie heavy with some of the former possessors of this land, who, first having robbed the aborigines of their paternal inheritance, took advantage of their tame and defenceless state, to thrust them down into the most abject servitude. In this, they are, by some, far worse treated than purchased slaves, who are spared, because if lamed or destroyed by excessive labour or cruel treatment, they cannot be replaced, but at an enormous expense. But there are yet superior considerations, which make us desire the propagation of Christianity among the heathen. They are summed up in that earnest prayer of every true believer, "that Christ may see of the travail of His soul and be satisfied." Though the conversion of the hearts of those, to whom his servants preach the gospel, is their principal aim, yet it is most gratifying to perceive, that even men of no religion acknowledge the effects of the gospel in the mind and manners of those, who have received it in faith.

From this place, we saw, for the first time, in the north-east horizon, the Winterhoeks mountains, which present themselves with many peaks.

CHAPTER XI.

Large aloes. Soete Kloof. Character of the country about the Chamtoos Revier. Narrow glens. Remarkable caverns. Chamtoos Revier. Klein Revier. Descent into the vale of the Louri Revier. Wild beasts heard in the woods. Old Paerl's account of Gnadenthal. Desire of the Hottentots to hear the gospel. The Galgenbosch. Hospitable reception at Klaarefonteyn and Kaffre Kraal. Van Staade's Revier. Thickets about the Zwartzkop Revier. Arrival at Uitenhagen.

WE could not set off till half past eleven, when we saw a country before us, apparently level, but full of dells and gullies. The great variety of bushes and flowering shrubs, on all sides, attracted our attention. Large aloes are interspersed among the bushes, and, with their broad leaves, form a striking contrast to the many small-leaved evergreens which surround them. Some of them were in full bloom, towering above the thicket, and one, more perfect than the rest, was brought into the waggon. The flower consisted of seven branches, one in the centre, and six surrounding it at regular distances. The centre branch was a foot and a half long, the rest about thirteen inches, all thickly covered with a succession of long, bell-shaped flowers, each orange-coloured at the stem, and passing into bright vermillion towards the top. The brilliant appearance of this huge flower, or mass of flowers, disposed like a chandelier, and mounted on a stem six feet in height, with a capital of massive leaves spreading above three feet in diameter, is beyond conception grand. The bountiful Creator has been pleased to clothe this country, unproductive as it generally is in means of subsistence for man and beast, with an astonishing profusion of vegetable beauty. Hardly a spot exists, upon which some curious and beautiful plant does not rear its head in its proper season; and in the midst of this brown desert, we see the magnificent chandelier, or red star-flower, measuring from four or five inches, to a foot and a half, in the spread of its rays, growing luxuriantly among stones and sand.

Unexpectedly, we found ourselves on the brow of a descent into a charming vale, called the Soute Kloof. We dismounted and walked into it. The whole country assumed a different character, as we approached the Chamtoos Revier. The descent into the Soute Kloof promised fair for a change in mineralogical appearances, for it was covered with fragments of a bluish quartz, with mica, and a disposition in the fissures of the quartz to chrysalization. A soft shistus broke forth in several places, but towards the bottom, all these favourable symptoms vanished, and the old combinations of sand-stone coloured by iron, with opaque veins of quartz, disappointed my wishes. Our attention, however, was sufficiently engrossed by the ever-changing scenery of this lovely spot. The elegant, but troublesome mimosa, occupies the greatest part of the wood, so as to render it in some parts impervious.

In passing over a gentle eminence, we were struck by the view of a remarkable cavern to the right, and left the waggons, that we might go and examine it. It consisted of a natural arch of about twenty feet span, the rock composed entirely of smaller or larger pebbles, cemented together by a ferruginous clay, so as to constitute a coarse pudding-stone. The whole appearance of the cavern was, in miniature, not unlike the rocks of Cushendun in the north of Ireland, which I visited in 1808. Mr. Melville, Schmitt, and Stein, climbed up the steep ascent into the cave, while I stood below, endeavouring to make a sketch of it. Deeply engaged with my work, and seeing Mr. Melville and Stein return to the waggon, I thought the whole party had left the cavern. Unexpectedly, I heard something stirring within, and stopped to listen. All was still, and I went on drawing, though somewhat alarmed. By and by, the noise increased, and fancying, that by our invasion of the den, we might have roused some wild animal, which are said to be numerous in these solitary woods, I started from my station, and was just going to run off, when I saw Brother Schmitt's arm reaching out of the mouth of the cavern, endeavouring to dislodge a fragment of the rock, to obtain a specimen. As I knew him to be perfectly tame, I ascended, and proceeded to examine it more minutely, but hardly ever remember to have been more truly and tremblingly thrown into needless fear.

Leaving the narrow glens about the Soete Kloof, we crossed a level piece of ground, loosely covered with thorn-bushes, and arrived at a farm near the Wagedrift, on the Chamtoos Revier, where we halted to make some inquiry, as to the places mentioned in Colonel Bird's list, and found them all occupied, or in requisition. The farmer from the Chamtoos drift, on Klein Revier, was at the house, and took a lift in our waggon across the ford. The Chamtoos is a considerable river. Its stream is clear and sweet, and we regaled ourselves with a good draught of these waters, which we had been so long seeking, but cannot make our own. All accounts agree, that every habitable spot on this river is occupied, and the poor Hottentots have even been deprived of their right to a place on Klein Revier, which a former Governor had reserved for them. The captain having been decoyed away under some pretext or other, and no more heard of, for want of an heir to succeed him, the right to dispose of the land fell into the hands of Government. The English Governors intended to restore it to the Hottentots, and it had been mentioned to me as a place suitable for a Mission; but being already in possession of a farmer, though without a grant from Government, I and my Brethren agreed, that here also, in fixing upon a spot for a settlement, we would not, by any means, thwart the views, or oppose the pretensions, however slight, of any individual. We therefore resolved to proceed to Uitenhagen, and consult the landdrost, to whom I had been favoured with a letter from the Governor.

On leaving the Chamtoos Revier, we passed through a thicket of mimosa, on level ground, till we arrived at the Klein Revier, when the farmer left us. Mr. Melville went with him across the river, in a canoc, half full of water, and returned with a bottle of sweet milk. Meanwhile I took the portrait of one of our oxen, whose horns spread to a greater extent, than any I had seen, the points being nearly six feet asunder. The brute stood patiently for his picture, but on attempting to measure his horns, he offered to use them in a way, that kept even his driver at a respectful distance.

We now entered a country similar to that in the Soete Kloof. The road winds through a low wood, and is extremely rugged, and full of holes. Many curious caverns appear in the hills, on both sides. From the kloofs, we ascended a barren hill, consisting of masses of iron-stone, the surface of some appearing as if they had been in the fire. They lay upon white clay, in some places powdered, and mixed with sand. At sunset, we intended to encamp for the night, but as the Hottentots assured us, that it was only an hour's drive to a much better out-spawn place on the Louri Revier, we continued our journey over the edge of a barren hill. Descending into the Louri Revier vale, we all left the waggons, as it was with great difficulty, and even hazard, that they were brought down in safety, the road winding through a dark wood, full of holes and dangerous slopes. It was a fine star-light night. All nature seemed hushed in peace, except that now and then the croak of some nocturnal bird, or some unusual sound at a distance, or on the nearer hill, attracted our attention. Knowing that these woods are haunted by tygers, wolves, and buffaloes, we frequently fancied those sounds to proceed from some greedy throats, in search of prey, and they occasioned just enough of alarm, to add some speed to our progress, and make us glad to hear the barking of dogs at the distant farm. There we had intended to spend the night, but when the waggons with Brother Schmitt overtook us at the ford, we resolved, after crossing the river, to encamp on the opposite bank, to shorten our journey; for, if we had proceeded to the farm, we must have returned to the ford. Mr. Melville rode to the house, where he left his horse in charge of two dragoons. On his return, he gave us but faint hopes of our being provided with the means of proceeding in the morning. Vorspann had been ordered here by the Veldcornet, but the farmer, Mr. Van Roy, being absent with two spans, his lady thought herself under no obligation to provide oxen for us. Mr. Melville, however, prevailed upon her to promise to let us have one spann in the morning, for a six hour's skoff, or half a day's journey. The second spann had been ordered by the Veldcornet to meet us at the Chamtoos Revier, and of course would miss us. Wolves were heard howling in the woods on the opposite bank.

3d. During the night, Sister Schmitt was alarmed by distinctly hearing tygers growling in the woods, on the hill nearest to our encampment. She got up quietly, Rambler following her, and went to the Hottentots, who were lying about the fire. By their report, she found that she was not mistaken. But not willing to alarm us, though I saw her return, and spoke to her, she did not mention it, till we rose in the morning. No traveller, however, need be afraid of the tyger of this country entering a tent. Unless attacked, or conceiving himself to be in danger, he cautiously avoids meddling with man. Whenever met with in an open field, if he has opportunity to escape, he makes off slowly and crouching, like a cat, but if prevented from escaping, is most furious and determined in self-defence. The woods about the Chamtoos and Louri Reviers are said to abound with them, and the very appearance of the country suggests the idea of its being a haunt of wild beasts. The hills, which are not high, are full of singular caverns and broken rocks, and the number of glens, intersecting each other in all directions, afford the best cover for all kinds of ravenous animals. Cattle are not considered safe, feeding in the woods or fields, and hardly in their kraals or pens.

Brother Schmitt, on mounting the hill near us, was delighted with this charming valley. His wife, meanwhile, visited the farmer's wife, Mrs. Van Roy. Thither we soon followed her. She was full of the usual complaints against the measures of Government, and seemed a woman of spirit.

After breakfast, we held a council, in which it was determined, that Mr. Melville, Stein, and myself, should proceed in the travelling-waggon with Mr. Van Roy's spann, to a farm, called Klaarefonteyn, and there hire oxen to fetch the baggage-waggon and the rest of our party from hence, and both proceed towards Uitenhagen with relays, ordered, as before, by the landdrost's letter of command; for we gave up all expectation of seeing the spann, sent, by mistake, to the Chamtoos Revier.

Meanwhile, Brother Stein had visited the Hottentots and slaves belonging to Mr. Van Roy's farm, in their bondhoeks, or huts, and had much useful conversation with them. They had heard, that we were in search of a place to build a settlement, and the Hottentots declared, that they would all come and live in it, that they might hear the word of God; and, had they known last night, that we were teachers from Gnadenthal, they would have come to our camp, and begged to be instructed. They had obtained some information of the aim of our journey from Leonhard Paerl, who, as our precursor, officiously announced our errand. He had sat up with them the whole of the night preceding our arrival, describing Gnadenthal, its regulations, its schools, the instructions given to the Hottentots in the Christian religion, the cultivation of the grounds and gardens, &c. interspersing his account with observations on the necessity of conversion, the happiness enjoyed by those, who believed in Jesus Christ as their Saviour, and their hopes of eternal life, after the death of the body.

This simple narrative had so much engaged the attention of these poor people, that they expressed the greatest eagerness soon to have the same benefit bestowed upon them, in this country. Though old Leonhard's officiousness, in thus informing the farmers and others, what we were in search of, in some instances, raised needless uneasiness in prejudiced minds, yet we forgave it, in consideration of his frequently adding observations, which may have been blessed by God in the hearts of those, that heard his artless speeches. Before we set out, a party of women and children came down to the river to see us. The children were all stark naked.

Marcus and Johannes attended the travelling-waggon. Our leader was a Hottentot from the farm. As we travelled along, we were greatly delighted with the variety and beauty of the prospects, that opened to our view. A dragoon had told us, that we should soon come into a country, looking like England, and we found his prediction verified. The so-called Galgenbosch, has very much the appearance of an extensive range of parks. We seemed to be passing from one park to another. The elegant mimosa is distributed upon the hills, in copses, or stands singly. Here and there a thicket fills a dell, or a wood of larger trees a wider glen. Clumps of high trees ornament the sides of the hills. Distant mountains of singular outline, with a nearer range of lower hills, ending towards the sea, with one of a conical form, present a most interesting horizon to the east, and the woody, wavy country between them and the road, affords infinite gratification to the eye of the traveller. But the habitations of man are very thinly scattered over an immense tract of country.

At two, we reached Klaarefonteyn, the farm of a Mr. Neukirch, of German origin, where we were most kindly received, and hospitably treated. Thick milk, bread of excellent quality, and a fried sausage were set before us. The old farm-house was burnt by the Caffres during the late invasion, and its ruins exhibited a proof of their savage mode of warfare. Mr. Neukirch was immediately ready to furnish oxen, to bring us to his brother's house, on Van Staades Revier, and, meanwhile, to send another spann, which should fetch the baggage-waggon from Louri Revier, and join us in the morning. After about an hour's rest, we left this hospitable dwelling, and proceeded through thick woods, which opened here and there, affording a peep towards the mountains to the left, or the coasts of the Indian ocean to the right, of the road. Before we descended into the valley, we met two waggons belonging to Bethelsdorp, full of Hottentots, but did not stop to converse with them, for which, probably, neither party could spare the time.

The descent towards the river is steep and rocky, and though lately much mended, very rough, almost resembling some of the roads in Plettenberg bay. Mr. Melville made a beautiful sketch of the view from the brow of the hill, towards the mountains. I walked alone down the road through the wood, examining the stones. On the summit of the hill, I found a white, gritty kind of limestone, but towards the bottom, nothing but a soft shistus, with quartz, and coarse sand-stone, too soft ever to make good roads. For about a mile, it leads through a wood of lofty trees, some falling through age, others pressed down by an immense quantity of bush-rope, or Bavianstau, some disfigured by mosses, or covered with wild vines and a variety of creepers, while others tower aloft, unentangled, in perfect health and beauty. An almost impenetrable thicket forms the underwood. The river flows in a deep, shady bottom, and the farm-house, called Kaffre Kraal, built of red brick, presents itself pleasantly on the opposite eminence overlooking a deep glen, enclosed by steep, woody hills. The premises are the cleanest I have yet seen in this country. We were well received by Mrs. Neukirch, one coming in after the other, and followed by the farmer himself, who had overtaken Mr. Melville, and heard from him our story and our wants. The evening was very agreeably spent with him and his friendly wife, and we were lodged in a room adjoining the dwelling, purposely built for the accommodation of travellers.

4th. We breakfasted with the family, and Mr. Neukirch's conversation proved him to be an intelligent, friendly, and honourable man. During the forenoon, waiting for our companions, Mr. Melville and I were engaged in writing and drawing, and Brother Stein in visiting the Hottentots and slaves. In one of the huts, he found several people assembled about a sick person, to whom he spoke of the love of God our Saviour towards the whole human race, and explained to the poor patient the way of salvation, when a woman, sitting in a corner, began to utter loud groans. As she would not yield to remonstrance, he was obliged to leave the hut. The people seemed to wish for instruction.

At twelve o'clock, Brother Schmitt and his wife arrived with the baggage-waggon. We had much regretted their absence, during the course of our delightful ride through the Galgenbosch yesterday. The Hottentots and slaves on Louri Revier, had come to their tent, but not before they were gone to bed. Our Hottentots would not disturb their rest, which they regretted, being ever ready, by day or night, to do the work for which they are appointed. At six in the morning, they set out for this place.

Our friendly hostess prepared an early dinner for us, and we left this hospitable house with sentiments of much gratitude to its inhabitants, for the kind reception and entertainment we had experienced. After crossing Van Staades Revier, a clear and rapid stream, we kept for some time along the glen, with a high woody bank on the left side of the river. Several secretary-birds made their appearance. They almost seem to know, that they are protected by man, on account of their services, in destroying serpents and other noxious animals; they therefore take no pains to escape.

On gaining the heights, we met our host's son, armed, who, with some other young men, were escorting a waggon, containing four of the rebellious boors, condemned to imprisonment and banishment for a certain term of years.

As we doubled the conical hill to the left, being the last of the ridge of hills above described, we noticed, on its declivity, some huge fragments of rock, and many of smaller dimensions, lower down, apparently thrown from the upper region by a convulsion of nature, or by some milder process. For several miles, the road passes over a dreary waste, after which we entered into a dense thicket, consisting of a vast variety of bushes, intermixed with aloes, Indian figs of different species, and many shrubs and flowers unknown to us. This thicket covers a great extent of country, and the whole of the hills descending into the vale of the Zwartzkops Revier.

Uitenhagen presents itself pleasantly, with its few white houses, and the mansion of the landdrost, at the foot of a range of low hills. A plain extends to the southward. Having crossed the Zwartzkops Revier, we reached the village about six o'clock, and pitched our tent on the common, near the beast-kráal and market. Mr. Melville, who went immediately to the post-office, and in search of friends, was everywhere unsuccessful. We regretted with him the absence of Mr. Swann, the surveyor, from whom we hoped to have received much information respecting the unoccupied parts of this district.

CHAPTER XII.

Transactions at Uitenhagen. Proposals made by the landdrost to extend our journey. Visit to Bethelsdorp. Remarks on the situation of that settlement. Hospitality of Mr. Von Buchenrode. Departure from Uitenhagen. Geelhoutboom on Sundays Revier. Elephants and buffaloes. Arrival at the Witte Revier. Description of the valley, and of the Schlagboom farm.

APRIL 5th. Our groom, Leonhard, having arrived two days ago, had called at the drostý, to exhibit our credentials to the landdrost, Colonel Cuyler. After breakfast, I waited upon the Colonel, and delivered to him Colonel Bird's letter, with another from the landdrost of George, Mr. Van Kervel. He received me with great civility, and offered me a room in his house, apologizing for his not being able to accommodate our whole party, as his rooms were occupied by offices of Government, the new building destined for that purpose.

being not yet finished. As I did not wish, on any account, to be separated from my companions, I could not accept his kind invitation. Speaking of the aim of our journey, he offered every assistance in his power, and seemed to wish to see a settlement of the Brethren formed in his district. For this purpose, he mentioned Klein Revier, near the Chamtoos Revier, as being a very suitable situation, with every requisite for a village of about five hundred inhabitants, which we might claim, the present tenant not having obtained any grant of the land. He likewise described another place in Achter Bruntjes Hoogte, as suitable, the lease of which was about to be called in by Government, as the possessor had been concerned in the late rebellion, and sentenced to be removed from that part of the frontier. One of his sons had been executed, and another banished, having been convicted of treason. The landdrost added, that there was sufficient land unoccupied on the Zondags Revier, (Sundays River), and wished, that we might visit that country.

On my return to the tent, we held some consultation about the proposals made by the landdrost, but could come to no determination. To an application for the possession of the Klein Revier farm, the same objections prevailed, which I have before stated; and we felt uncomfortable in the idea of occupying a place, of which an old tenant and his family had been deprived, though as a just punishment for their misdeeds. Colonel Cuyler followed me to our encampment, to invite the whole party to dinner.

During the forenoon, we were visited by several Hottentots belonging to Gnadenthal, at present serving in the Cape regiment, and by others, who sought to make acquaintance with our people. The keeper of the tronk (prison) and his wife very civilly offered their services to do any thing for us; and the Secretary, Mr. Allen, a friend of Mr. Melville's, with great kindness, appropriated a room in his house for our accommodation, in case a change of weather should make us wish to leave the tent. We accepted of his invitation, and removed our bedding into the house.

The afternoon was most agreeably spent with the landdrost and his lady at the drosty. After dinner, we visited a young lion chained in the yard, larger than a mastiff, perfectly tame, of the large black breed, that is, having a black mane, and black bush at the end of his tail, but otherwise of a dingy brown, or tawny-colour. Like others of the feline tribe, he seemed fond of being stroked and petted, and, like a house-cat, shoved up against the person fondling him. Yet it appeared prudent to keep one's hand at a respectful distance from his wide mouth. He continually uttered a kind of friendly growl, the double base to a cat's purring. A silver-grey monkey also, of singular beauty, full of tricks, but of what species I cannot tell, diverted us for some time. He had been a great favourite in the family, till, interfering too much with the children's comforts, stealing their victuals, and doing other mischief, he was now sentenced to exhibit his pranks in the yard, on a pole with a bar across, where he yet retained his friendly disposition. Both the lion and monkey had been inhabitants of the neighbouring hills.

The landdrost entered with much interest into the business we were engaged in, and showed himself well-disposed towards the civilization of the Hottentots. His lady had visited Gnadenthal.

Being so near Bethelsdorp, the principal establishment of the Missionary Society in London, he offered to furnish us with a relay of oxen to our travelling waggon, that we might visit that place.

6th. About eight o'clock in the morning, we set out, taking Marcus, Johannes, and Lebrecht Aris, with us. The road is not interesting, but after crossing the Zwartzkops Revier, about an English mile from Uitenhagen, runs over a wild, level country, till within sight of the village.

We were received with great kindness by the missionaries, Messrs. Messer and Hooper. The former is by birth a German, and the latter an Englishman. Mr. Read, the principal, or director of all the missionary establishments of the above-mentioned Society in Africa, was absent, having accompanied Mr. Williams into Caffraria, where, it was said, king T'Geika had applied for a settlement, or a "school," as the institutions of that Society are here called. We cordially wish success to every attempt to make the gospel known among the heathen, and hope, that their exertions will be attended with permanent benefit to that wild and ignorant nation.

After being introduced to Mrs. Messer and Mrs. Williams, who seemed pleased to make acquaintance with Sister Schmitt, we walked out to see the settlement. Mrs. Read is a Hottentot woman, and did not join the party, but was visited by Sister Schmitt at her own house. Mr. Melville was so deeply engaged with reading the account of Bethelsdorp in the Rev. Mr. Campbell's journal, that he did not accompany us in our walk, especially as he had no inclination to take a view of a place, so totally destitute of any thing picturesque.

We had been willing to believe, that the very unfavourable accounts, given by travellers of Bethelsdorp, were greatly exaggerated, if not altogether false, and that it was not to be credited, that a Society, possessed of such ample means, would suffer any of their settlements to remain in so disgraceful a state, as to be always brought forward against them, as a proof of the unprofitableness of their missionary exertions in this country. But I am sorry to say, that as to its external situation, nothing can be more miserable and discouraging. Men, therefore, who judge only from outward appearance, are apt to draw inferences to the prejudice of its inhabitants. This is acknowledged by Mr. Campbell himself, and he offers an apology, which such as view the subject with a favourable disposition towards the main purpose of the institution, will admit. What may have been the motive of its founder, Dr. Van der Kemp, for fixing upon a spot, in every respect so little calculated to raise any thing but disagreeable sensations in a traveller's mind, I cannot tell. The district of Uitenhagen was at that time but very thinly occupied by settlers. Government most generously offered every facility, and gave him his choice of the best places in its territory. He looked at some, and at length sat down in the most barren, desolate, unpromising desert I have yet seen in all South Africa.

He was an eccentric character, but a man of cool judgment, and I make no doubt, had he been alive, would have given plausible reasons for his choice; though they might not have satisfied a man, who, while he loves and admires, above all, the Creator, cannot be totally indifferent to the beauty of his works, but seeks thankfully to enjoy those advantages and conveniences, with which God has so abundantly stored his creation. Yet they would have exhibited to the mind of a candid inquirer the truly sincere and religious motives, by which this venerable man was actuated on all occasions.

His successors, however, are to be pitied, as being now obliged, not only to dwell in a situation incorrigibly bad, but continually to hear the severe and unjust remarks, made in consequence of its wretched appearance. Not a tree is to be seen, excepting two or three ragged speckbooms, standing before Mr. Read's house, and scarcely a blade of grass. The hills, enclosing the small kloof near the village, are completely barren, and their outlines tame and uninteresting. The small brook, if it deserves that name, coming out of the kloof, is quite insufficient for the purposes of irrigation, or to supply water for a mill; nor could we comprehend, how so large a fraternity as are said to dwell here, obtain water enough for common use. This being a time, when most of the inhabitants are with the boors, we saw very few of them, nor did they appear disposed to notice us. The arrival of our waggon seemed to excite no curiosity whatever. In this respect, we perceived a great difference between the inhabitants of Bethelsdorp, and those of Gnadenthal, upon which our Hottentots made some sensible remarks. Towards evening, a few old men approached the waggon, in the shade of which our people were resting, and entered into conversation with them, but from us they seemed to stand aloof.

We were, however, received and treated with the more kindness and with truly brotherly affection, by the missionaries, and though it happened to be a busy day with them, several affairs of house-keeping, such as baking, brewing, &c. having been undertaken, and our unexpected visit therefore seemed out of season, yet they exerted themselves to make it agreeable. Mrs. Messer provided a good dinner, and her husband devoted himself to us, as much as the necessary operations, already commenced, would allow. Meanwhile I made a few sketches of the interior of the settlement, chiefly of the church and Dr. Van der Kemp's dwelling. Both these buildings are singular monuments of the peculiarity of his taste. The church is an angular structure, or rather consists of two buildings, placed together nearly in a right angle. The inner walls meet; the outer are connected by a wall, elliptical in its form. In the middle of this junction, the minister's seat and desk are placed; thus he may be seen and heard by the whole audience, though the men and women, who sit separate, cannot see each other. The building is low, with small square windows, thatched, and without a ceiling. A small room or closet is boarded off on the men's side, containing what is called the library. The books are chiefly for the use of the school, besides some religious publications. A few minerals and stones brought from Latâkoun, the Namaqua country, and other stations, constitute the museum; but they were much injured, no one seeming to pay attention to mineralogy. Dr. Van der Kemp's house is about eight feet square, made of unburnt brick, and covered with thatch. It stands near the church, and is now in possession of the mother of the Hottentot woman whom he married, some time before he died.

Having finished my sketches, Mr. Messer accompanied Brother Schmitt and me through the village. Complaints having been made, that the huts and cottages lay scattered, without any regularity, we saw a beginning of forming regular streets with houses of unburnt brick, which, when completed, will be a great improvement. A new school-house, with a printing-office annexed, is in forwardness, and will add much to the value of the establishment. After dinner, Brother Schmitt walked with me into the kloof, where Mr. Messer, with great labour, has made a garden, which produces a good crop. The other gardens do not look well, for want of trees and hedges. The mill was quite out of repair and useless; nor is the mill-course well contrived, so as to obtain the full force of the scanty supply of water. On returning from the kloof, we entered a smith's and a carpenter's shop, but found, that they had not been used for some time. Meanwhile Sister Schmitt procured some matting, our stock being much worn. Both she and Brother Stein had entered several houses, with a view to visit and converse with the inhabitants, but it did not seem, as if their visit gave much satisfaction. The people appeared timid and reserved, and we understood, that Dr. Van der Kemp's caution against making too free with strangers had created in their minds a disposition to reserve, which they did not at all understand when to lay aside.

From the more elevated part of the settlement, Algoa Bay is visible. We would gladly have accepted of Mr. and Mrs. Messer's kind invitation to stay over night at Bethelsdorp, but we began to be covetous of our time, nor had we yet come to a determination respecting the landdrost's proposal for a continuation of our journey towards Achter Bruntjes Hoogte, in search of unoccupied land. We had therefore ordered our waggon to be ready at seven o'clock, but heard, that the oxen had strayed and could not be found. Mr. Messer therefore hired a spann for us, when, unexpectedly, Lebrecht Aris brought back our own. It was dark, but fair, and Marcus, by good driving, brought us to Uitenhagen, in three hours and a half.

7th. After breakfast, going to the drosty, I met Colonel Cuyler coming towards our tent. He turned back with me, observing, that he had something to communicate, which he thought would be worthy of our attention. We had been conversing much at breakfast about his proposal to visit some situations on the Zondag's or Sunday's river, and had nearly resolved to proceed no farther in our search. But now the landdrost informed me, that he had been made attentive to a situation on the Witte Revier (or White river), flowing from the eastward into the Sunday's river, which possessed abundance of good grass, wood, and water, was yet unoccupied, and might be applied for, without in the least interfering with any other person. He therefore advised us, by all means, to go and see it, and as Mr. Knobel, the district surveyor, just then entered the room, the landdrost desired him to give me a particular account of it, and directions how best to proceed. He also generously offered every assistance in horses and oxen, to convey us thither.

On my return to the tent, I made a report of this new proposal, and all agreed, that, as to the situation on the Witte Revier, we should not do right in declining so kind an offer; but we yet retained our scruples, as to the propriety of applying for the estate of a man, banished for treason, whose relatives would surely not be satisfied, to see a place so long in possession of the family, transferred to other hands.

To-day, being Palm-sunday, we had a public meeting in our tent. We read the lesson for the day, after which Brother Schmitt delivered a short discourse and prayer. Many Hottentots attended, sitting in and about the tent, with great devotion. After service, I accompanied Sister Schmitt to the tronk, to see a young Caffre, who had been taken in the act of stealing cattle, some days journey from hence. His person was athletic, his countenance open and pleasant, and as a token of special favour, he presented Sister Schmitt with a shell, taken from his necklace. He could only converse with us by signs.

I next waited on the landdrost, to inform him of our resolution to accept his offer, as it respected the Witte Revier, but stated our objections to going to Bruntjes Hoogte. He brought forward so many reasons, why we should at least go and look at the latter place, that on a second consideration, we determined, not to leave any thing relative to the business committed to us unfinished, which might, perhaps providentially, become a means of contributing to promote the aim of our journey into this distant part of the colony. On acquainting the landdrost with this result, he expressed much satisfaction, and furnished me with the necessary papers.

1. An order for relays. 2. A letter to Dr. Mackrell, agent for Government at Somerset, on the Boschberg in Bruntjes Hoogte. 3. A plan of our route. 4. A list of places, where we might find good quarters, with the names of the farmers. 5. An order to Messrs. Schepers, sen. and jun. occupying farms at each end of the Witte Revier Valley, to shew us their land-marks, and the unoccupied ground on that river.

The weather had totally changed, and it rained hard all the afternoon. We drank tea with Mr. Von Buchenrode, a German gentleman, residing here as a merchant. He willingly rendered us every service in his power, and indeed it was well, that we found such a generous friend at Uitenhagen, where, as yet, little is to be had, either for love or money. We had depended upon being able, at this principal town of the district, to furnish ourselves with a sufficient supply of wheaten bread and other provisions; as also to replace our stock of crockery, the greatest part of which had been broken, either by the over-setting of the baggage-waggon, or by other means. Mr. Knobel, the surveyor, joined us, and we spent the afternoon in pleasant conversation. Mr. Von Buchenrode gave us some interesting account of the country we were about to visit, and the wild animals infesting it.

Sister Schmitt going to the tronk, was introduced to the prisoner C. B. confined for six months, according to the sentence pronounced against some, who had joined in the late rebellion. The poor man appeared much humbled, and expressed a hope, that, by God's mercy, this affliction might lead him to consider the concerns of his immortal soul, and seek true rest and salvation in Jesus. He now read the Bible with attention, and a sincere desire to profit by it. The keeper of the tronk, and several of the military, besides the Hottentot soldiers from Gnadenthal, were glad to attend our family-worship.

8th. The rain continued with such violence all day, that we were obliged to postpone our departure. During the night, a dog entered the tent, and carried off a butter-pot, wrapt in a napkin, and a pair of springbock horns, given me by Colonel Cuyler. We gave them up for lost; but they were found in a ditch near the tent. He had devoured the butter, half of the napkin, and part of the skull belonging to the horns. * This is the second time, that we have been thus robbed by these half-starved animals.

Some Hottentots, who visited us in the tent, were desirous to know our opinion concerning the groaning practised by some of their countrymen, during divine service. We answered, that we believed, that the work of God's Spirit was not to be sought for in noise and external marks, which might be affectation, but in a humbling sense of our sin and need, and in a broken heart and contrite Spirit. The Lord was not in the wind, nor in the earthquake, but in the small still voice.

Mr. Von Buchenrode having invited our whole party to dinner, we again met Mr. Knobel, when, after a long dearth of music, I was extremely gratified to find in the latter an excellent performer on the piano-forte and flute. We spent two or three hours in playing Haydn's and Mozart's duettos, to the great gratification of our hearers. Little did I expect to have such a treat in this distant corner of the earth.

Towards evening, the rain ceased, and we prepared to set out in the morning early, hoping that the rivers were yet passable.

9th. Though the morning was again rainy, we determined to proceed, and I went to take leave of the landdrost, and make some final arrangements. Nothing could exceed the kindness and good-will of Colonel Cuyler, who acted as if he were personally interested in the success of our expedition. He showed me the horses destined for us, with his own travelling horse for myself. Once more I paid my respects to the young lion, who came forward to be stroked. A servant had this morning killed a puffadder near the drosty. This venomous reptile was about three feet long, four inches in circumference, its head flat, the variegated spots on the back beautifully and regularly arranged, black upon a greenish-grey ground.

Besides the oxen and horses provided for us, the landdrost sent drivers and guides, and two Hottentot soldiers, who should escort us through the Witte Revier Valley, and to Kourney. Before we set out, a number of persons, both whites and Hottentots, came to bid us farewell, and express their best wishes for our success. Our departure was delayed till near nine o'clock. The caravan consisted of our two waggons, each with ten oxen and a guide, two of our own horses, three from the landdrost's stables, and two Hottentot soldiers, armed with musquets, and dressed in green jackets, with a powder-horn and knapsack.

On quitting Uitenhagen, we soon entered the same kind of thicket of brush-wood and bushes, which surround the village on all sides, and cover every eminence. Our attention was again much engaged with the curious plants and flowers, growing luxuriantly among the bushes. Now and then we sent one of the men to fetch some remarkable flower for our inspection. Here, for the first time, we saw Hottentots riding on oxen. The halter or bridle, is fastened to a piece of wood, passing through the cartilage of the nose, by which the beast is easily guided. In about two hours, we reached a farm, with a decent-looking dwelling-house, and a mill. Brother Schmitt walked with me down the river-side, to the mill. The main wheel lay horizontally, the water taking the cogs sideways. This kind of water-mill is common here, of very simple construction, but has but little power.

The next place we touched at, was on the Kouga Revier, where we entered the house, and found a friendly family, from whom we purchased milk and butter. While I was admiring a large favourite cat, the farmer observed, that he valued that creature as much as the best of his numerous dogs. She destroyed not only mice and rats, but even large snakes, which she attacked by beating them about the head, till they were stupified, then, seizing them by the neck, killed them with her teeth.

The road continued to lead through bushes, during the whole of the day, excepting where an opening occurred, with a few scattered copses of trees. On our approaching Geelhoutboom, which, according to the directions given, we were to make our first night's station, the Hottentot soldiers and old Paerl rode forward in full trot. This made us rather uneasy, especially when it grew dark, our own people being unacquainted with the road; but when we arrived, we forgave them, on finding that they had kindled a large fire in the wood, and fixed upon a place of shelter for our tent. The weather now seemed to clear up, and the moon shone bright. Two fires were kindled, to which we dragged branches of trees, if possible, to keep them blazing through the night, as a guard against wild beasts, buffaloes having been observed by our horsemen to enter the wood before them, and elephants being often seen in these parts. I slept in the baggage-waggon; and towards morning heard, with concern, the rain violently beating against the covering.

9th. When we rose, the clouds had dispersed. We were thankful for the return of fair weather, as this was the day, when we hoped to see the spot, on which, if it so please God, a congregation gathered from among the heathen, at some future period, may dwell, in the enjoyment of Christian privileges.

One of our Hottentot soldiers having shot a brace of wild Guinea-fowl, brought them into the tent, and presented them to Sister Schmitt. They were remarkably large and fleshy.

We now surveyed the place, where we had spent the night. It was an opening in a wild wood, with tall trees, and much under-wood, not five minutes walk from the banks of the Sunday's river. A quantity of elephant's dung, partly fresh, lay between us and the river, which seemed to indicate, that even during the night, some of these huge creatures had passed that way. Tygers are said to be numerous in the thicket, but we neither heard nor saw any of these animals, so carefully do they avoid the presence of man.

After breakfast, our party divided, according to the landdrost's direction. Brother Stein and Sister Schmitt remained with the wag-gons, and with one of the Hottentot soldiers, and the guides, went straight to Kourney. Mr. Melville, Brother Schmitt, a soldier, and old Paerl, accompanied me on horseback to the Witte Revier. The Sunday's river flows here between high banks, covered with a forest of great extent on each side. Its bed is full of large round stones, which makes the ford unpleasant. The water was about three feet in depth, but in the rainy season, the stream is very deep and rapid. As soon as we had mounted the heights, and got through the wood, Mr. Melville found some sport. Chase was made after antelopes, and wild hogs, but in vain: an unlucky falcon, however, perching upon a tree, was brought down by a bullet. It was a large, handsome bird, about the size of a turkey, white and dark-brown being its principal colours. After we had left the wood, the country appeared pleasant, with good grass and many bushes, either standing singly, or in clumps. We directed our course towards a range of woody hills, and into a valley, through which the Witte Revier runs into the Sunday's river. At the farm of Jacobus Scheper, senior, the valley contracts, so as to form a glen, its entrance shaded by large trees. Here a party of foot-soldiers, occupied a military post. The old farmer was not at home, but his wife and daughter received us in a friendly way. We produced the order from the landdrost to her husband, to show us his landmarks, and the unoccupied land, but did not trouble her to give us a guide, the Hottentot soldier being well acquainted with the place. The English soldiers here behaved to us with great civility. They showed us several skins of animals they had shot in the neighbourhood, among which were those of a buffaloe, some tygers, a lynx, a jerboa, called springhaas by the Dutch, a creature of the didelphi kind with very long hind-legs.

We now proceeded on our journey, and entered the wood at the opening of the glen. The sun shone bright, and the morning-showers had given new brilliancy to the rich verdure. We were charmed with the variety of trees and bushes, through which we rode, and noticed several large butterflies, with wings of the richest azure, sporting in the sun. Meeting with Mr. Jacobus Scheper, jun. we presented the landdrost's order. He begged to ride on to his father's farm on some business, but soon returned to us, when he gave us every information respecting the premises. The river, which we crossed several times, at fording-places, darkened by the shade of lofty trees, runs with a rapid stream over a stony bed, here and there dipping under heaps of stones. These, in my opinion, having been brought down from the mountains by floods, have accumulated to a height above the common level of the water, as in Jackal's Kraal, (p. 163). In some places, the river forms a fine broad surface, passing quietly, though rapidly, along. As this was not the rainy season, there appears to be, at all times, a sufficiency of water for every purpose, with fall enough, either to work a mill, or to be led into any part of the more level ground.

But much as we were pleased, and almost enchanted, with the beauty of the glen, Brother Schmitt at first objected to its narrow width, which indeed, on entering, appeared little more than a few hundred yards, till we had penetrated about a quarter of an English mile into it, when it spread considerably, the hills receding on both sides. To the left, they are high, and full of kloofs, containing large timber. A range of lower eminences lies at their foot; having, as we were informed, plenty of good pasturage upon them. To the right, the hills are lower, but more interesting in their appearance. Their tops are covered with bushes, the lower region steep, and, in many places, supported, as it were, by rocks of a deep red colour. These rocks are concrete masses of pebbles and clay, strongly impregnated with iron. The colour of some of them approaches even to pink or lake, with white or yellow veins. At every turn, the outline of the hills varies, presenting some picturesque scenery. Leaving the path, which runs nearly through the middle of the valley, we rode towards the right and left boundaries, to examine the nature of the soil, or the course of the river, or to ascend some eminence, affording a better view of the different situations beneath. About the middle of the vale, our attention being attracted by the appearance of a high red rock, we turned towards it, and found it rising perpendicularly beyond a large sheet of water. Between it and another rock on the opposite bank, a woody glen descended, probably containing some stream, contributing towards the formation of the lake or pond. Both in and out of the wood, we had discovered abundant traces of elephants, both by their foot-marks, their sleeping-places, their dung, and by several thorn-bushes, torn up by the roots and placed on their crowns, that these creatures might eat both the leaves and the more tender roots, of which they are said to be particularly fond. We now found the whole field near the pond covered with their dung, which shows that they frequently resort to this place, for water. In the day-time, they generally hide themselves in the large woods and kloofs, but at night, descend to quench their thirst. Leaving the pond, we crossed a stony eminence and descended into the glen, where the Caffres in 1797 had their chief encampment.

This glen intersects the main valley. To the left, it forms a passage towards the high mountains, which are entirely covered with forest-trees, and to the right, divides a lower range of hills. They here assume singular forms. Mr. Scheper justly compared one of them to a fortification; semicircular caverns appearing in rows, much like some of the works, seen in antient strong-holds. Towards the end of the valley, the mountains, to the left, are higher and more imposing, and their numberless kloofs, filled with wood, give them a peculiar character. After again several times crossing the bed of the river, we entered upon the premises belonging to our guide, Mr. Scheper junior. The farm lies in a most romantic situation, at the bottom of an amphitheatre of lofty hills.

It would be tedious to attempt to particularize all the various beautiful objects surrounding this place, but we all agreed, that it was one of the most singular spots we had seen during the whole journey. To the right, a steep woody bank terminates in a high black rock, on which stood a tall tree, spreading its branches above the rest. Under this tree, Mr. Scheper had placed a seat, and there found a safe retreat, from whence he might fire at elephants passing through his premises, without danger of an attack from them, if not immediately killed.

The old farm-house and out-houses were demolished by the Caffres, about fifteen years ago. The present dwelling, put up in place of the house burnt by those ferocious invaders, is a hovel, not much better than a Hottentot's bondhoek. We found Mrs. Scheper at home, and met with a friendly reception. Some dragoons stationed here, seemed likewise pleased with a visit from their countrymen. If this delightful spot were situated in a country, where protection might be had from wild beasts, and still wilder men, it would be coveted by every lover of fine scenery, and fetch a great price. But here it is of little value, as long as the unhappy disturbances between the boors and the Caffres continue to exist, even when no actual war is carried on. Mrs. Scheper, who was a person of better appearance and manners than many of her class, grew eloquent in describing their situation: "What signifies," said she, "our building a good house to live in, and substantial and expensive premises, in a place like this, when, before we are aware, the Caffres push through the wood, set all on fire, and murder those, who cannot save themselves by flight? Again, what pleasure can we have in a fine garden, stocked with good fruit-trees, and garden-stuff, when, after all our trouble, the elephants descend from the kloofs, break through fences and railings, as if nothing was in their way, pull up or tear to pieces our trees, trample down or devour all our crops, and lay the whole garden waste? No! we must make shift as well as we can, and the less we have to lose, the less we have to regret." She seemed to speak from a feeling of much unhappiness, in being obliged to dwell in such a country.

This beautiful valley is indeed, at present, the habitation of several wild animals, but would cease to be so, if inhabited by any number of human beings. It is now merely the passage of a few persons, between the farms at each end, except, that while they are military posts, some soldiers pass to and fro. We were told, that some time ago, a soldier, walking alone, came suddenly upon an elephant, (which may happen, if the creature is to leeward, so as not to perceive the approach of man by his smell). Whether the soldier made the first attack or not, is not known, but the elephant, after treading off his leg and thigh, hip and all, threw the body into the bushes. The limb, trodden to pieces, was found in the road, with his cap and accoutrements, but not the body, till after some days. The elephant and rhinoceros consider large bushes no more as impediments to their progress, than a man does tufts of grass in a field. They are not to be stopt by common fences or palings, and walk unconcerned through the thickest underwood, in a straight line, tearing up or pressing down even stout thorn-bushes, with stems as thick as a man's leg. Of this we saw frequent proofs in the Witte Revier Valley. If, therefore, a settlement were made here, the first settlers might certainly be in danger of sometimes having their gardens and fields invaded, and even trodden down or grubbed up by these animals, and perhaps suffer other losses by ravenous beasts, who have hitherto considered the valley as their patrimony. But, in a few years, the mischief would gradually cease, as these creatures retire from the habitations of man; which they are always known to do.

In the records of Riebeck, the first Dutch Governor at the Cape, we read of the ravages committed by lions, tygers, and other ferocious animals in Capetown itself, the whole country around being infested by them. But now, though the population is so thin, they have retreated into the most distant parts of the colony. Before our missionaries settled at Bavians Kloof, the kloof was the haunt of hundreds of baboons and other wild animals. These also have, by degrees, retreated, and but seldom come from the mountains to steal peaches, or other fruit. The ringing of bells, cracking of whips, and firing of guns, often repeated, will at length drive them away, though they may, for a time, dispute possession.

When we left this beautiful spot, Mr. Scheper accompanied us for several miles. Our road to Kourney lay over a steep, stony hill, thickly covered with almost impenetrable bushes, at the top of which, during the war, the Caffres placed a huge beam, at each end fastened with thongs to the trees, hoping thus to prevent the boors and soldiers in the valley from following them, to recover cattle, or to attack them. From this circumstance, the place has acquired the name of Slagboom, or (turnpike-bar). In riding up the hill, Mr. Scheper pointed out the plant, from which the Bosjesmans extract poison for their darts.

CHAPTER XIII.

Arrival at Kourney. A cow devoured by a wolf. Sand Vlachts. Night's encampment on the Zuurberg. Celebration of Good-Friday. Burning Kraal. Forsaken post at Commadocha. Hospitality of the officers at a military station. Arrival at the Great Fish River. Peep into Caffraria. Proceed to Somerset. Dr. Mackrill. The Boschberg. Easter-Sunday. Survey of Mr. P's farm.

FOR some miles we passed through detached woods, then gained an open, uninteresting country, over which, after bidding farewell to our friendly guide, we pushed on, as fast as our weary and hungry horses could carry us, till after sunset, when we reached Kourney, and were joyfully welcomed by the rest of our company, who had safely arrived with the waggons. They had been very civilly received and treated by the farmer, Mr. Osterhuysen, and by the officers of a detachment of infantry stationed here, who had invited them to dinner, and were waiting for our arrival, to treat us with coffee. But as Captain Terry was much fatigued by a ride from Graham's town, we only paid a complimentary visit, and went to the farmer's house, where we spent a very pleasant evening. Mr. Osterhuysen is a man upwards of seventy years of age, but remarkably lively, and full of anecdotes, which he relates with great spirit. There is something uncommonly benevolent and good-humoured in his countenance, and whole manner. After supper, Brother Schmitt was desired to read and pray with the family, all the slaves and Hottentots being admitted. When he had read the lesson of the day, as prescribed in our Church, he addressed them in a short discourse, which, as we afterwards heard, made a salutary impression upon several of the audience. Many expressed a wish, that we would form a settlement in this country.

Before we went to rest, a wolf, prowling about the farm, set up a dreadful howl. The cattle had just been secured in different kraals; but one unfortunate young cow had strayed and could not be found. During the night, the bellowing of the poor beast proved, that she was suffering from the jaws of the ferocious monster. Brother Stein, who slept, as usual, in the tent, with the Hottentot soldiers and some others, set out for her rescue; but as the cries became fainter, and at length ceased, they returned. In the morning, the mangled and gutted carcase was found among the bushes.

11th. I wrote a letter to the landdrost, and sent it by the Hottentot soldiers, who returned with the guides, horses, and oxen, to Uitenhagen. Mr. Osterhuysen having provided us with two spans, we set out about nine o'clock, and arrived by an uninteresting road, at Sand Vlachte, a farm in a dreary flat, with mean-looking cottages, out-houses, and Hottentots' huts. Soldiers were quartered here, as security against the Caffres, whose depredations were conducted at this time with great boldness. The military live in huts, constructed of reeds and rushes. The farmer and his wife were hardly civil to us, and we had to wait long for the relays, ordered to meet us at this place. Standing with Mr. Melville and Brother Schmitt near a Hottentot hut, I heard a woman, with a good voice, singing a hymn to a very jiggish and trifling tune. I observed to my friends, how much it was to be regretted, that through ignorance and bad taste, such wretched compositions had been introduced, and were now sung by many congregations, instead of the grave and devotional old church-tunes, upon which a soldier, who stood near us, and every now and then had put in his unasked-for opinion on the subject of our discourse, interposed, and with much impertinence, cloaked in religious expressions, asserted, that the tunes were very fine, and pleased him wonderfully; "but," added he, "mayhap you are one of those gentlemen, who are enemies to the work of faith." After a vain attempt to convince him, that an enemy of bad music might yet be a friend to a genuine work of faith, we left him to the enjoyment of the quavering song, and the satisfaction of having boldly opposed an unbeliever. It is by such rudeness, that ignorant novices bring religion into disrepute with the world, forgetting the courteousness taught and practised by our Saviour and His apostles, as consistent with that humility and lowliness of spirit, which those should learn of Him, who profess to take His yoke upon them.

We now proceeded towards the Zuurberg, and after some time, entered a woody country. In one place, a road has been cut through the bushes and wood, parallel to the old worn-out track. The nearer we approached the mountain, the more were we entertained with the surrounding scenery, the road winding through narrow valleys, or over eminences, covered or crowned with wood. On arriving at the foot of the mountain, which is very steep, the oxen made a dead stand, and it was long before they could be brought to go forward. When driven, they turned about, or backed, so as to endanger the safety of the waggons. Having thus extorted some resting-time from their impatient masters, and recovered strength, they patiently dragged the waggons up the hill, though towards the summit the road was extremely rough and stony. After quitting the wood, we found ourselves on a barren heath, from which the prospect was very extensive, and we could trace our route nearly all the way from Uitenhagen. Looking forward into the country, into which we were about to descend, our guides pointed out to us, at a vast distance, the Boschberg, the proposed extent of our journey. The sun had set, and we were anxious to reach the valley, the wind being high and very cold, but our guides declared it impossible for the oxen to proceed a step farther. By blundering or ignorance, they also missed a place, where there was a sufficiency of water for their poor beasts; thus, after searching in vain, we were obliged to encamp on a dry spot, where very little fuel was to be procured. The moon shone bright, but the wind rose, and our tent was nearly blown down.

12th. Glad to leave this uncomfortable night's lodging, as soon as the day dawned, we descended into the valley. We were overtaken by ten dragoons, and pleased to be able to serve one of them, by taking his and his horses accoutrements into our wagon, the horse being sick, and obliged to be led. Among other singular plants on the Zuurberg, we noticed a species of the Wageboom, with a much broader leaf than that, which we had hitherto seen on the hills about the Kromm Revier. The outside was a dark green, the inside silver-grey, covered with a white down. At the bottom of the hill, we encamped near a farm destroyed by the Caffres, and forsaken, where we found the bed of a brook, with only a few puddles of muddy water remaining in it. This, however, was all we could procure, both for ourselves and our thirsty oxen.

Being Good-Friday, we called to mind the great event celebrated on this day, in the Christian Church. We were in spirit with our congregations, met in so many other parts of the world, as it were, under the Cross of our Redeemer, and partaking of that consolation, which is to be found in the remembrance of His sufferings and death for us. But even here, in this lonely vale, secluded from all Christian society, we and our Hottentots were not forgotten by Him, who has promised, that He will be with His followers always, even unto the end of the world. Having seated ourselves, after breakfast, in a semicircular excavation of the bank of the brook, Brother Schmitt first read the lessons of the day, out of the Dutch translation of the Harmony of the Evangelists, while we followed our Lord, in spirit, through all the scenes of His sufferings. We prayed, that the Holy Spirit might apply the merits of His passion and death to our souls, and convince us, that "He was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities," and that the word of His Cross might approve itself the Power of God in this country also, for the conversion of many heathen. No service in any church or chapel could be attended with more solemnity and true devotion, nor with a more heart-reviving sense of the presence of the Lord, than our worship in this earthen temple.

On leaving this place, we ascended to a wide waste, similar to the Karroo, in view of a range of hills, connected with the Zuurberg, and remarkable for that regular division by kloofs, so common in this country. Each has a hillock at its foot, shaped like a cushion, of which we counted above twenty, having almost exactly the same form and dimensions. Not nature herself, but some violence done to her, has produced this extraordinary phenomenon.

We ought now to have directed our course, according to the landdrost's advice, to the farm of Cornelius Engelbrecht, but our ignorant and obstinate guides, notwithstanding all my protestations, carried us right out of the regular track. We passed a farm, said to be burnt by the Caffres. Either by accident or design, the beast-kraal was also fired. The immense quantity of dung, heaped up for years, and now as dry as chaff, was yet smothering, and volumes of smoke arising from it. The house, and several soldiers' huts stood empty. About two in the afternoon, we reached Commadocha, a military post, lately forsaken. Viewing it at a distance, we pleased ourselves with the hopes of there procuring a fresh supply of good water, milk, and other articles, of which we were in want. But not a dog came forth to notice our arrival, much less a human being. The place was surrounded by a mud-wall and a ditch. The wall had loop-holes, and small bastions at the angles, sufficient to resist any attack of undisciplined Caffres. We entered this lonely place with some caution, but found every part of it completely emptied of furniture. Two or three old hats were lying about, which might have been very serviceable to our Hottentots, but they would not take them, observing, that their owners were not there to permit it. We acted with the same honesty, in not seizing upon three pigs, and a number of hens and chickens, running about the garden and bushes. Three small dogs, nearly dead with hunger, were lying within the wall. A fine cat came purring towards us out of a bush, which we fed and intended to carry to the next post, but she would not stay in the waggon.

The whole situation, with the surrounding country, looked dreary and comfortless in the extreme; and having rested about half an hour, we proceeded, and arrived about sunset at a military post, at that time commanded by a Lieutenant Forbes. The lieutenant, and Ensign Dingley, offered us every assistance. Being in want of several articles, we procured them from the contractor, whose shop was situated on the other side of a narrow vale. The ensign, however, soon came to fetch us back to his hut, and insisted on getting a dinner cooked for us. Having been advised to take advantage of the full moon, and proceed to the next station, we were obliged to decline his offer, but accepted of that of the lieutenant, to take coffee with him. He presented Sister Schmitt with a loaf of wheaten bread of superior excellence, which proved a great treasure to us. The road was good, and we arrived in about two hours at the post, near the banks of the Great Fish

River, the boundary between the colony and Caffraria. Having pitched our tent not far from the kraal, we spent the night quietly, though we afterwards heard, that, on that very day, the Caffres had stolen fifty head of cattle from the neighbouring farm, and that several boors and soldiers were in pursuit of the thieves. Report added, that being overtaken, they quitted their prey, but wounded a boor in the neck with an assagay, and carried off the fire-arms of two others.

Some Hottentots from the kraal, visited us late in the evening, among whom were two women belonging to Gnadenthal, whose husbands were soldiers. Brother Schmitt had some conversation with them, admonishing them, so to conduct themselves in this strange country, that the cause of the gospel might be honoured, and not disgraced.

13th. Rising at day-break, we heard some people singing hymns in one of the Hottentots' huts, near the farm. They belonged to Mr. Vanderhagen's congregation, at Grahamstown. Meanwhile Mr. Melville on foot, and Brother Schmitt on horseback, had set out for the river, being determined to cross it, if only for a few moments, to set foot on Caffre ground. Thither we followed them with Brother Stein. They had found the ford very bad, the bed of the river being full of sharp rocks. However, both gained their point, and stood some time on the opposite bank. The rest of our party were satisfied to get upon a sand-bank in the middle of the river, which was here no wider than a large brook.

This part of Caffraria presents itself with hills of moderate height, and a smooth outline. The plain next the river, and ascent towards the hills, are studded with the mimosa, and seem to be good grazing ground. The road on the Caffre side was blocked up with thorn-bushes, as a signal that none are allowed to pass that way. On returning, Brother Schmitt found some difficulty in remounting his horse, and we felt rather in fear, lest the frightened animal should do some harm either to his rider or himself.

Our prayers, this morning, were offered up with peculiar fer-vency, that the Lord might soon cause the light of His Gospel to shine upon that benighted country, in full view of which, we travelled nearly the whole of the day, at no great distance from the banks of the river, through a dry, barren waste. We halted near a farm, where we were long detained, to give our weary oxen time to pick some food. The young men from the farm paid us a visit. Our ignorant guides being quite unacquainted with the road, we had to depend upon the sagacity of our own people, to bring us to the Boschberg. Mr. Melville had left us this morning, having received information, that his friend Mr. Swann, a Surveyor to Government, was employed at a neighbouring farm. He intended to join us again at Somerset, the residence of Dr. Mackrill, in Bruntjes Hoogte.

At sunset, we arrived at a farm, to which the road prescribed by Colonel Cuyler, would have brought us in the forenoon. The farmer, Van Klerk, received us civilly, and sent a lad to show us the way to Somerset. But on arriving at the ford of the Little Fish River, which we were now about to cross for the third time, and not knowing, whether Mr. Melville had reached Somerset to announce our approach, we thought best to encamp on its banks, lest we should prove troublesome to the Doctor, by an unexpected arrival, at so late an hour. Our people kindled two large fires, for which we found plenty of fuel. As it was very cold, and the wind rose so much, as to threaten our tent with an overthrow, we spent the night rather uncomfortably.

14th. Easter-Sunday morning. How different was our situation to that of most of our Brethren on this great memorial-day! Instead of being, with them, early engaged in declaring our joy over the glorious resurrection of the Lord, and remembering, at the graves of our departed friends, the truly Christian hope of a blessed immortality, imparted to us by faith in our glorified Redeemer, in whose likeness we once shall rise, we were here encamped on the banks of an African river, never before visited by a member of our Church, and consulting how, we should best introduce ourselves to a man, with whom none of us, but Mr. Melville, had the smallest acquaintance. However, we were in spirit with our congregations, adoring our risen Lord and Saviour, who, though withdrawn from mortal sight, is present with His people, in every corner of the earth. The result of our deliberations was, that I should take old Paerl, and ride to Dr. Mackrill's house, previously to announce the party. After crossing the river, and reaching the top of the bank, the country assumed the appearance of a park. The land was covered with short grass, and the thorn-bush, dispersed in clumps, or standing singly, its greatest ornament. The mountains of the Boschberg had a pleasant appearance, illumined by a morning-sun. Dr. Mackrill's house lies under one of the highest parts of the range, and is a small neat building of unburnt brick, stuccoed. Adjoining to it, are several out-houses, and huts for his slaves. The premises have a much cleaner appearance than those of even the most respectable farmers in the country, with whom neatness and cleanliness seldom enter into calculation. One of them once answered an observation I made on the subject, thus; "What should I be the richer for it? Plantations, and the other arrangements you propose, would cost me money, and do me no good." But Dr. Mackrill is an Englishman. The name of Somerset has been given to the place, in honour of the present Governor.

On approaching the house, I was met by Mr. Melville, who had arrived last night, expecting that we should soon follow, preparations having been made for our accommodation. The Doctor, to whom I presented the letter from Colonel Cuyler, received me with great politeness, and immediately dispatched a servant to the river, to bring in the whole party. After breakfast, we went out to view the garden. It lies at the foot of the mountain, and is stored, not only with a great abundance of every kind of garden-produce, but, the Doctor, being a good botanist, has transplanted into it a great many of the flowering plants from the wilderness and woods, and by culture, very much improved their quality and beauty. Here is every thing requisite for an excellent garden: great depth of the richest soil, water in abundance, and hands to work. The orange, and other fruit-trees, appear in great perfection. The Boschberg, rising immediately behind the garden, is a beautiful mountain, of considerable height, intersected by many kloofs, filled with wood, the intermediate eminences, like buttresses, supporting the mountain. They swell, towards the bottom, into hills of fanciful shape, covered with green sod of the richest hue, excepting where the wood stretches from the kloofs over part of them. At the top of these buttresses runs a horizontal ledge of rock, partly covered with bushes and creepers. A precipice of a red colour, with grey veins, and overhanging a wide kloof filled with timber-trees, has a singular effect. The region, beyond the rocky ledge, is rough, but grassy. The mountain recedes to the right and left, and, towards the north-east, seems to rest upon another range, of similar character. It has an even outline, and, beyond the summit, on the side of Graaf Reynet, is said to shelve off more gradually.

We observed two large baboons, sitting separately on projecting rocks, probably placed there by the troop, as centinels, to guard against surprise. Though somewhat intimidated by our shouts and menacing gestures, they seemed determined to keep their station, sometimes slowly retreating a few paces, and then returning to their seats, showing their teeth and grinning defiance.

When we left the garden, passing by a low shed, a serpent, of the most vivid green colour, beautifully marked upon the back, and spangled with silver-coloured spots, reared its head from the thatched roof, and hissed at Brother Schmitt. He killed it with his stick, and brought it out. The Dutch call it, Dachslange, (roof-serpent), as it seems to like to hide in old thatch, and is said to be very venomous.

We now visited the shop, containing every article, of which either the boors, the Hottentots, or Caffres in the neighbourhood might stand in need. It is under the superintendency of Dr. Mackrill. Here may be had iron and tin-ware, cloth, muslins, silks, pots and pans, and even tobacco and snuff. Government, in promoting this speculation, had a benevolent design; wishing to promote confidence among the neighbouring Caffres and other tribes, who, being in want of many articles of convenience and comfort, might purchase them here by barter, or otherwise. Thus, friendly communication being established, and more wants created, or rather, a better knowledge given them of the advantages of the arts of civilization, a disposition to industry might, by degrees, be introduced.

In this view, no objection can justly be raised to a creation of additional wants among a savage and ignorant people, whatever some philosophers may say of the happiness of a state of nature. To assert, that at length, by abuse, it may end in greediness, covetousness, and rapacity, is no more than saying, that every faculty and disposition of the human mind, may be turned, either to a good or bad use, as directed by a good, or perverted by an evil spirit. The original plan of the establishment at Somerset, was, to improve the extraordinary goodness of the ground belonging to the farm, for the cultivation of tobacco, which during the American war had risen to an enormous price in the colony. Dr. Mackrill being a man of extensive knowledge and active patriotism, proposed to Government the improvement of the growth of that article in this newly-acquired colony, not only with a view to cheapen it here, but to furnish a supply for exportation. Being permitted to fix upon a situation for that purpose, he wisely chose perhaps the finest in the whole district of Uitenhagen. But the war ceasing, and tobacco being again sold at a price so low, as to destroy every prospect of advantage to the colony, the plan was changed. Corn is to be the principal produce in future.

After dinner, we took a walk to see the land belonging to the farm. Its boundary, to the eastward, is a rapid brook, proceeding from the mountain, and emptying itself into the Little Fish River. The greatest part of the valley is sprinkled with thorn-bushes, some of which are of extraordinary size and beauty. The brook forms two very fine cascades before it enters the river, and the glen, through which it descends, is truly romantic. The upper fall is over eight or ten ledges of rocks, and the lower plunges, in several streams, into a deep basin. Large timber-trees, and wide-spreading bushes adorn the steep banks of the brook.

Our company accidentally dividing, I walked with Dr. Mackrill through the wood, in which he hoped to treat me with a sight of buschbocks, and some of the many monkeys that inhabit it. We saw none; but the footsteps of a tyger were distinctly marked on the sandy path; and two serpents were killed.

After tea, many Hottentots and slaves came to the tent, to whom Brother Schmitt read the history of our Saviour's resurrection, and delivered a short discourse. The poor people seemed very attentive and thankful.

15th. The aim of our visit to Somerset, was, by Dr. Mackrill's assistance, to obtain some knowledge of the farm, belonging to a Mr. P., now taken from him by Government, on account of the part he took in the late rebellion, and, as above stated, proposed by the landdrost, as an eligible situation for a missionary establishment, for which he thought it might be easily obtained, notwithstanding there had been some idea of making it a military post. Though we could not get over our objections against applying for the possession of a confiscated domain, yet we should not have felt satisfied hereafter, had we not accepted of the landdrost's kind offer, to give us an opportunity of seeing its situation. We therefore left Somerset for Mr. P.'s place, about nine o'clock, Mr. Austin, the deputy farmer, and Mr. Oakely, a young gentleman, studying under the Surveyor Mr. Swann, accompanying us on horseback. Mr. Melville had gone to the house of Commandant Nels, to meet his friend Mr. Swann, and we sent the baggage-waggon, to wait for us at Mr. Van Klerk's.

Our conductors thought, that our aim in visiting Mr. P.'s farm, had better remain unknown, and the party be announced as only accompanying an English gentleman on his travels through the colony.

We crossed the Little Fish River twice, keeping along the plain, in a line with the mountain, and in about an hour's time, reached the dwelling of this singular man. It was a poor cottage, no better than a Hottentot's house; but the vorhaus, or hall, was large enough to contain a pretty numerous company of rebels.

Mr. P. is father to one of those lately executed: another son was transported; and one would feel more pity for the poor man, had he not been a principal promoter of the late disturbances, though prevented from taking an active part, on account of age and infirmities. His house, however, is said to have been the nursery of sedition, where the rebellious boors had frequent meetings, and were advised and encouraged by the old man. He had, throughout life, been noted for his opposition to Government, and more particularly hated the English, for making its measures more effective, than the Dutch were able to do.

Notwithstanding his escape from the fate, which overtook his rebellious sons, yet both his former conduct in aiding and abetting, and even his present encouragement of every remaining disposition to revolt, has induced Government to use the power vested in it, and, by cancelling his lease, to make him quit the farm, remuneration being given for the opstall, that is, for the buildings and improvements. The official notice had not yet reached him.

I could not help contemplating the old man with much compassion. He spoke of the loss of his son, "who was no more," and of the other, "who had left the country," as having so discomposed his affairs, and disturbed his mind, that he intended to sell his farm, and move into some other part of the colony. He related, that he had been settled in South Africa, ever since the year 1771, and for his own pleasure, travelled through it in all directions, even among the Bosjesmen and Caffres, by whom he had always been treated with the greatest kindness and regard. He had a good deal of the cant of our English democrats, and self-named philanthropists about him. He behaved very civilly to us, though I was announced as an Englishman, but while I was walking over part of the grounds with Messrs. Austin, Schmitt, and Stein, not knowing that Sister Schmitt was an English woman, he betrayed his hatred against the nation: "The English," said he, "pretend to know, that this country lately belonged to the Caffres, but I know better. Not a Caffre lived here, when I first came into it, nor yet within a great many miles beyond the Great Fish River, but the English think themselves the wisest of men."

This place is undoubtedly a most eligible situation for a missionary settlement, possessing corn-land and pasturage, and well supplied with water. The valley is very extensive, and connected with others, enclosed by branches of the mountains. We looked at a wolf-house on a heathy eminence behind the garden. It is a walled trap, resembling a mouse-trap, with a falling door, awkwardly constructed. In this trap, five wolves have been caught within the last three months. The Brethren Schmitt and Stein continued their walk towards the hills, and down the valley, while Mr. Austin returned with me to the house. The buildings form a very unsightly groupe of hovels, bondhoeks, and ruinous walls. Dung, rags, remnants of half-devoured carcasses, and other filth, surround the dwelling on all sides.

Beyond this place we did not extend our reconnoitring journey. The lauddrost had indeed most kindly expressed a wish, that we would go yet farther, and examine situations on Bavians Revier, in Graaf Reynet, a river flowing into the Great Fish River; but as he could not point out any particular place, yet unoccupied, and I had heard, that the only land worth possessing, on that river, was on the Caffre side, where no Hottentot settlement could be formed with safety, and having likewise far exceeded the time appropriated for this expedition, we resolved to return from hence to Gnadenthal.

CHAPTER XIV.

Return to Uitenhagen. Commandant Nels. Ostriches. Wild Peacocks. A Puffader killed. Herds of Springbucks. Restless night spent at Engelbrecht's farm. Tarantula. Encampment on the Zuurberg. Night's lodging at Kourney. Destruction of the garden by three elephants. Part of the company go to the Witte Revier. The Ados Drift on Sunday's river. Arrival of both parties at Uitenhagen. Report concerning the Witte Revier Vale. Journey from Uitenhagen to the Chamtoos Revier. Visit to Klein Revier. Observations made by farmers on the measures of Government. Wild oxen. Elland's Fonteyn. Kliphübel.

ON arriving at Mr. Van Klerk's farm, we spanned out in the field. The provision made for us by Dr. Mackrill, was such, as to render us independent of the assistance of the family. It was not till after sunset, that we left this place, and set out for Commandant Nels' farm. Here we were kindly and hospitably received both by him and his wife. They have no family of their own, but have adopted six children of poor neighbours. In this, as in other instances, they showed much superiority of character. Mr. Nels was sent by Colonel Cuyler to the rebellious boors, to endeavour to bring them to reason, and to promise forgiveness of the past, if they would only return to their dwellings in peace; but they not only paid no attention to his remonstrances, but when he was gone, said, that they were sorry they had not shot him. As a reward for his courageous conduct on many occasions, he received a beautiful double-barrelled gun from Lord Charles Somerset.

We found here, our friend Melville, Mr. Swann, Mr. Oakely, and very comfortable accommodations. Nor would Mrs. Nels take any pay for our excellent supper, breakfast, provender for the horses, and several articles of house-keeping, given to us. Brother Stein had slept in the tent, but was much disturbed by the howling of wolves, by the cattle breaking out of the kraal, and the attempts made to secure them again. Indeed we were thankful to find, that none of our loose oxen had fallen a prey to the nightly depredators.

16th. We set out about nine o'clock, accompanied by Messrs. Swann and Oakely. The road was hilly and stony, and the country barren. After about three hours' ride, we halted on the waste to dine. The horsemen preceded us, in hopes of shooting some game, but were unsuccessful, though many ostriches, wild peacocks, korhans, (black-cocks), and antelopes were seen. A large puffader, however, received the contents of Brother Schmitt's gun. This powerful and venomous serpent was crossing the road, under the feet of the oxen. It was a novel sight to see him twining his clumsy body upon the sand, which he did with a scraping noise. The Hottentots were extremely eager to pursue and destroy him; but to approach this serpent is dangerous, as by throwing himself backward, he is sure to wound any object near him. He would have escaped, but for the gun being ready loaded. He was about three feet long, and three inches in diameter.

We made halt for half an hour, at Mr. Van Vyver's farm, and proceeded across a flat country, covered with heath and a few low bushes. Here we were amused by the sight of some hundreds of springbucks, one of the most elegant antelopes of this country. They stood in parties of twenty or thirty together, and our sportsmen were all alive, endeavouring to approach near enough to make sure of their aim. But all attempts were vain. The bucks suffered them to approach to within gunshot, when they set off full speed, leaping sometimes over each other. They bounded along, in a species of dance, springing with all four feet at once from the ground, then, swiftly facing about, surveyed their pursuers. Sixteen shot were fired at them, but not in a single instance did it appear that one had been wounded.

This afforded me great pleasure, for as we had no dogs to run down and secure any one that might have had a leg broken, or been otherwise hurt, it must have given pain to any feeling mind to know, that the poor animal was lamed, and grievously suffering, without benefit to us, and would most likely be made the prey of some cruel, ravenous beast. Could we have obtained one of them for our subsistence, the killing of it would have been excusable. The shot fired contributed, though not to our gain, yet to our pleasure, for it set them in motion, and the swiftness and elegance of their movements were well worth observing. Nor did we fail altogether, for Brother Schmitt brought down a wild peahen, which increased our stock of provisions. It was a beautiful bird, though not equal to the cock in brilliancy of colour, being chiefly of a brownish grey and black.

At night, we arrived at Cornelius Engelbrecht's farm. The old man was not at home, and the family, consisting of several young men and women, hardly bid us welcome, but suffered us to put up our tent on their dirty werft. We placed it between the waggons, and after a dish of coffee, went to rest, intending to set out as early as possible in the morning. About one o'clock, I was waked by a snuffling and bellowing noise close to the tent. In a short time all were roused from sleep, by the frightful roar of a bull, which, having broke out of the kraal, was parading up and down the werft. Sister Schmitt rising and looking out, saw him coming straight towards us. He pushed on between the waggon and tent; and had his feet got entangled in the tent-ropes, the overthrow of our dormitory, and perhaps worse mischief, might have been the consequence. The whole place was soon in an uproar. All the oxen in the kraal, availing themselves of the breach made by the bull, went off full trot into the wilderness. Our oxen did not stay behind. All the young men were up, shouting and hallooing, calling the slaves, and, as the whole herd rushed with great impetuosity by the tent, they had the kindness to order them to be kept off, lest we should be overrun. The sheep and goats in an adjoining kraal, whether from fright, or envying the horned cattle their happy escape, bleated aloud, the dogs barked, the children screamed, and even the geese and ducks joined in the horrible concert. This hubbub lasted for more than two hours, and when we arose, in the morning of the 17th. Not an ox was to be seen, far or near. Men were sent in every direction, but it was nine o'clock before our cattle were brought back. Meanwhile the young people had grown more friendly, and inquired for Gnadenthal knives, called Boschlemmer.

Being anxious to get across the Zuurberg before dark, we thanked God, that the weather remained fine and clear, and about noon reached the same valley, which had been consecrated by our Good-Friday's service. But now we found the brook perfectly dry. The poor thirsty oxen, as soon as unyoked, rushed towards it, and thrust their noses into the reeds, which filled its bed; first into one place, then into another, where they hoped to find water, but in vain. They then lifted up their heads in bitter disappointment, and bellowed forth their complaints. Having sent our people to the old forsaken kraal, to search for water, to our great joy, a pond was discovered, with fresh water in abundance. When driven to it, the oxen could hardly leave off drinking. Meanwhile the wind rose, and before we arrived at the top of the mountain, it blew a hard gale. We therefore hurried down the other side into the woods.

Having left the waggon, I walked down the steep declivity with Mr. Melville, at a little distance from the road; he, in search of plants, and I, examining the stones. Having discovered some small crystals in a vein of quartz, I took up the stone, and feeling something soft under my thumb, turned it up, to see what it was. I found, that I was pressing upon a young tarantula, about the size of a halfpenny. Its legs, which were chequered with brown and white, were doubled under its body, the creature being probably asleep. I shook it off, and called my friend to inform me, what sort of a spider I had encountered, when he congratulated me on my having escaped its bite. I felt, in truth, thankful to God for my preservation. We descended, till we arrived at a snug place, enclosed with high trees and bushes, where we pitched our tent, and made two large fires, partly with a view to keep off wild beasts, with which these forests abound. Our weary oxen found good grass and some water in pools, and we suffered them to feed for two hours. They were then tethered to the waggons, for security's sake, but disturbed us much during the night. Some needless alarm had also seized our people, as to danger from Caffre thieves, who were said to be hid in the woods. We commended ourselves, with full trust, to the mercy and protection of our Almighty Preserver.

18th. We set off early, and at the place, where, in the late Caffre war, the Caffres had their principal camp, we met five waggons with a detachment of infantry, going to establish a military post on the Boschberg. At Sand Vlachte, neither bread nor milk was to be procured, the soldiers having consumed the whole stock. After a short stay, we pushed on to Kournèy, where we arrived at four o'clock, and resolved to spend the night. Mr. and Mrs. Osterhuysen received us with their usual friendship and hospitality.

Our Hottentots having expressed a desire to see the valley of the Witte Revier, we held a consultation with them in the tent, to contrive how they, with Brother Stein and Sister Schnitt, might accomplish it. We wished our people to judge of the fitness of the place by their own observation, as much depended upon the report they might make to their brethren, on their return to Gnadenenthal.

19th. We rose about five o'clock, and after another conference, resolved, that as our oxen were too much fatigued to undertake the journey, Mr. Osterhuysen should furnish a spann, which should convey the abovementioned party to the Witte Revier, while Mr. Melville, with myself, Leonhard Paerl, and Johannes, should proceed straight to Uitenhagen.

During the night, three elephants had entered the officer's garden, at the bottom of the eminence on which the farm was situated, and demolished nearly all the produce. They had pushed down the gate and a fig-tree near it, trampled upon several beds of onions and cabbages, eaten what they liked, and marched off through the fence, towards a pool of water. Captain Terry, who commanded here, walked with Mr. Melville and me through the garden and fig-orchard, where we measured the diameter of their round foot-marks. They were of three different sizes, of fourteen, ten, and eight inches in diameter, the latter probably of a calf. Having breakfasted with the captain, we set out and took the road to the Ados Drift, on Sunday's river. By the way, we saw abundant traces of recent works of elephants, trees pushed down or pulled up by the roots, and near the road a great quantity of fresh dung, as likewise a large thorn-tree, with a stem nearly a foot in diameter, standing topsy-turvy, on its crown, with only one large root, at the top, all the smaller being devoured, as well as the more tender parts of the bush and the leaves.

At noon we reached some hovels near the drift, where we found a slave, a Hottentot woman, and a few children, got some milk and butter, and a miserable dinner. Our few biscuits were spoiled by a poisonous lizard, which had crept into the basket, and were given to the hungry dogs. Near the place lay the horns of a large koodoo, with the tips cut off to make tobacco-pipes. I had hoped to have gained an opportunity of examining the steep banks of the river, but now saw with concern that I could not possibly reach the limestone-rocks on the opposite shore. They have many extraneous fossils imbedded in them. We found the ford very practicable, and in the evening, sought shelter from drizzling rain, behind a bush of speckboom, where we got a good night's rest in the waggon.

20th. We set off early, got a little refreshment at Sandfonteyn and reached Uitenhagen about noon, where we were cordially received by Colonel Cuyler, and dined with him, in company of Major Fraser, the deputy-landdrost from Graham's-town, and two other officers.

Our company returned from the Witte Revier late at night.— Their report was very satisfactory. The Hottentots were much pleased with the situation, and declared, that a settlement might be made there with every convenience required by a Hottentot congregation, there being much sweet grass, which, in their opinion, is a point of the first consideration. They had with much difficulty reached the Ados Drift yesterday night, and spanned out among the bushes. Elephants and rhinoceroses had left so many traces of their existence in the wood, that they were not without apprehensions of being disturbed. In the morning early, they forded the river, but the weariness of the oxen was so great, that they could hardly creep along.

On leaving the Witte Revier, Brother Schmitt addressed the party on the aim of our visit, and prayed the Lord, if it were His gracious will, to establish here a place, in which his name might be glorified. He then opened the collection of Scripture-texts for every day in the year, and the text which immediately presented itself to his view, is so remarkable, that I cannot help quoting it.— It was the 12th verse of the 33d chapter of Jeremiah: “ Again, in this place, which is desolate, without man and without beast, and in all the cities thereof, shall be a habitation of shepherds, causing their flocks to lie down.” We pray, that with respect to this desolate spot also, this encouraging prediction may be fulfilled.

21st. During the day, our old friends, and several Hottentots visited us. I called upon Colonel Cuyler, who kindly furnished me with the needful orders for relays, both through his district, and to George. The whole party dined with Mr. Buchenrode, who approved himself our true friend, both during our former and present abode at Uitenhagen. Mr. Allen, the secretary, again offered us every assistance in his power.

22d. We left Uitenhagen at nine o'clock, and at half past three, reached Kaffre Kraal, Mr. Neukirch's farm, on Van Staades' Revier, where we were again hospitably treated. The charming glen and woods, through which the river runs, delighted us anew; and finding oxen ready, we proceeded, without much delay, to Klaarefonteyn. Mr. Neukirch's brother received us with expressions of much pleasure, and I found here time and opportunity to continue my diary, with ink, made of the leaves of the Wageboom. The process is simple. The leaves, dry or fresh, are boiled, with a rusty iron nail, and a piece of sugar-candy added, when the decoction becomes a fine black ink, used for writing, dying, or as a black-reviver. I purchased here from a poor tenant, a pair of buffaloe-cow horns, and Mr. Neukirch presented me with a beautiful pair of buschbock horns. I was happy to be able to return his civility, by giving him an eight-bladed knife, which was greatly admired and valued. He had a buffaloe calf in a kraal, with other young cattle. Its hair looked very rough, and it was said to be wild and unruly. Among the mountains, there was much vivid lightning.

23d. On leaving Klaarefonteyn, we again very much admired the beauties of that tract of country, called the Galgenbosch, and the weather being fine, we beheld it to great advantage. To the right of the road, and towards the hills, the character of the country is truly singular.

About noon, we arrived at the Louri Revier, when Mr. Melville and I, mounting our horses, crossed the river, and rode up to the farm-house, half a mile distant, to pay a visit to the farmer, Mr. Van Roy, of whom we had heard a good character from the Neukirchs. I had likewise an intention of purchasing the horns of a buffaloe bull, which he had shot some days ago. Having an opportunity of conveying such subjects of curiosity to England, I had begun to make a collection of the horns of animals, peculiar to this country, which, with other curiosities, I wished to present to the College of the United Brethren, at Nisky, in Saxony.

We found Mr. and Mrs. Van Roy at home, and well pleased with our visit. After some conversation, we inquired about the horns. He related, that about ten days ago, he had met with and shot at the buffaloe, in a wood not far off, and wounded him in the leg. The animal fled, but being pursued and brought down by the dogs, was shot a second time through the head. When Mr. Van Roy showed us the head, he said, that he meant to make a tobacco-pipe of the points of the horns. We expressed our regret, that so beautiful a pair of horns should be destroyed in that way; but he replied, that it would cost him five dollars to get a pipe of that kind. Mr. Melville, supposing him to mean that each horn would make one pipe, asked me, in English, whether I would give ten dollars for the head, to which I agreed. On hearing this, the truly honest farmer exclaimed:—"Ten! no, I said, five would be required to get a tobacco-pipe, and I will take no more from that gentleman." A slave was then set to work to cut off the superfluous bone, and make it more portable. He now brought the head of a buffaloe cow, shot some time ago, and would have given it into the bargain, but I paid him what I had given for the first of the kind I purchased.

He invited us to stay and dine with him. Among other questions respecting England, and English customs, he laid a case before us, wishing to know, how he was to act, consistently with English law. One of his Hottentots had shot his neighbour's bull, mistaking him in the dark for a wild buffaloe. The neighbour required, that he should pay the damage, which he refused, on the ground that he had not shot it, and the Hottentot had nothing to pay. We told him, that in England, a master was responsible for the deeds of his servant, and the Hottentot having done it, while employed by him, and with his gun, we thought, that he would get nothing by a suit, but do best to compromise the affair, and pay for the bull. He spoke as a friend to the English, but regretted, that they were losing their popularity in the colony, by taxation, and the mode of settling the quit-rents. He thought it hard, that when a man had done every thing in his power to improve his farm, by making water-courses for irrigation, clearing land, &c. that those very improvements should tell against him, and he be charged a higher rent than his neighbour, who was an indolent man, suffering his estate to go to decay, when, in fact, it was better land, and more productive; and therefore more able to bear the burden; "But," added he, "we would bear taxation, if the English would only keep a large military force in the country, as by that means, we should obtain a ready sale for our corn and other produce, and have wherewith to pay. But now they are withdrawing their troops." As staunch friends to our country and its Government, we heard this man's very sensible remarks with concern, and wished, that means might be devised, consistent with the just and benevolent disposition of our present administration, to grant relief, and make the occupation of this land by the British, considered a blessing, and not a curse, as we have sometimes heard it called.

We now returned to our encampment on the river, and found that Brother Schmitt had meanwhile proceeded with the baggage-waggon to the Chamtoos Wagendrift on Klein Revier, whither we immediately followed, and reached the ford about sun-set. The farm-house was a miserable hovel, and could not afford a lodging to our party; yet, as it lightened much, and threatened to rain, we were desirous of obtaining better shelter than the tent. After some search, we fixed upon a forsaken blacksmith's shop, consisting of two small rooms, one containing the forge and anvil, the other empty. We got them well swept, and put down our mattresses.

Not feeling much disposed to sleep, I placed my desk upon the anvil, and, seated upon a wooden block, continued writing, while my friends rested. It was a providential circumstance, that I remained awake. The door was made of rushes, fastened together with thongs, in a slender frame, and had no lock. The rushes did not reach to the top of the door-way, and I was twice disturbed by a cat, scrambling up from the outside, and jumping over into our dormitory. This, however, proved a slight disturbance. About midnight, the bull and other cattle broke out of the kraal, and the unruly beast came bellowing up to the door, which he began to push about with his horns. I was much alarmed, as very little force was required to throw it down, when we should have had a very troublesome guest in our quarters. Being afraid to face him in the dark, I made some noise within, when he took himself off, yet every now and then approaching, in his perambulations. I therefore immediately fell to work, to make a fastening to the door, with a piece of iron, found in the forge, which I worked into the wall, and tied to the door with a strong thong. Yet, after all these precautions, I hardly ventured to lie down. Between four and five in the morning, two thunder storms, with heavy rain, passed successively over us, and we were thankful for the shelter we had found. They followed the course of the Chamtoos Revier from north to south.

24th. The Klein Revier farm, mentioned above, as recommended to me both by the Colonial Secretary, and the landdrost of Uitenhagen, as a place suitable for a missionary establishment, lies about two or three English miles from the Chamtoos Wagendrift, in the hills, higher up the river. Though a farmer had applied for it, and it was therefore contrary to our views to take advantage of his not having obtained a grant, yet I felt it my duty to go and look at it, both that it might not appear, as if we were indifferent to the kindness, that had dictated the offer, and that I might obtain more information on the spot, respecting the intentions of the present claimant. After breakfast, therefore, I rode with Brother Schmitt and Marcus to the place, our host very civilly accompanying us. Brother

Stein, and Lebrecht Aris followed on foot. We crossed the Klein Revier at two fords. The vale is full of bushes and large timber, and pleased us much. The hills on each side are not high, and covered with wood to their summits. Large thorn-bushes occupy the greatest part of the banks of the river. Tall Geelhoutboom trees and other ever-greens exhibited some fine forest scenery. As we approached the place, we met the farmer going with some Hottentots to cut down bushes, and open a better way from the drift. He sent his men on, and returned with us. The dwelling-house was on a rising ground, and little better than a Hottentot bondhoek. A hut stood near it, and these two miserable tenements contained at present the whole family. The farmer's wife appeared to be a sensible and civil woman, and presented us with all her house afforded, sweet milk. The vale is not to be compared with that on the Witte Revier, either for extent, fertility, or beauty, but the Klein Revier is a clear, ever flowing, rapid stream.

On our return, we were accompanied by the farmer, to whom, however, we did not explain the aim of our visit. The strata of red rocks, forming the western bank of the Chamtoos Revier, have a striking appearance, of which, during our absence, Mr. Melville had made a drawing. We had to wait till noon, before the oxen were sent, according to order, to put us forward on our journey, when we got well through the Wagendrft, the ford of the Chamtoos river, and the Soute Kloof, and passing by Mr. Simon Fercira's farm, arrived at night at a farm-house called the Ausflucht, (Emigration), where we were accommodated with a chamber. Mr. Melville went with the young farmer to the gardens, lying at a little distance, to hunt porcupines, which is done by night; but none made their appearance.

25th. Before we set out, I took a walk with Mr. Melville into the garden, where the dogs had killed one of these singular animals. We left this place at eight, called at Mr. Miller's farm, and provided ourselves with a supply of necessities.

Between this and Essenbosch, we met Mr. Akkerman, who returned with us, that he might not lose the bargain he proposed to himself, by selling us a spanni of oxen, according to a former offer. By the way, we dined in a pleasant valley, under some trees. At Essenbosch we staid but a short time, to purchase some wheaten bread, and a rehbock antelope, shot by a Hottentot lad, for which he asked a dollar and a half. Brother Schmitt proposed to him, to take a boschlemmer knife instead of the money, lest he should spend the latter in brandy, and lose all advantage of his day's work. Our Hottentots likewise urged him to take the knife, which, after long demur, he agreed to; but, still undetermined, fumbled about, and among several knives, could not find one to suit his fancy, while his sheepish, suspicious looks, and confusion in examining the knives, afforded much merriment to his countrymen. At last, he chose the worst, and sneaked off, with silent murmurs at not having turned the rehbock into brandy.

We had no time to pay a farewell-visit to the lady on the other side of the glen, (p.189), but after a tedious ride in the dark, along the Kromm Revier, and through some deep ravines, reached a farm-house, pitched our tent near it, and enjoyed a quiet night's rest. It lightned much in the east and north.

26th. We set out before day-break. It was a clear, autumnal morning. The high peaked hills, to our left, had emerged from the dark mists, which surrounded them last night, and the sun broke forth with splendour. The farm we had just left was forsaken by the former possessor, who declared himself unable to pay the new duties, charges for measurement, and high quit-rents. Another farm in the neighbourhood, was forsaken by the husband of the lady of Essenbosch, for the same reason. These effects of the present system seem to demand a revision of the mode of carrying it into execution, which so many farmers, in the interior, assert to be done, without due discrimination or knowledge of local circumstances. We trust, that, as his Excellency the Governor is about to undertake a journey to the frontier, he will hear and judge for himself, how far these repeated complaints are well founded; for it is to be supposed, that as all innovation is generally resisted by uninstructed people, many may too soon have taken the alarm.

After a pleasant ride through the Kromm Revier Valley, we reached Jagersbosch, Mr. Akkerman's farm, about nine o'clock. Mr. Melville had rode on to farmer Marcus, to procure oxen.

27th. Mr. Akkerman's house was full of people. Some were sick, and every thing within the wretched rooms looked very uncomfortable. Sister Schmitt therefore prepared breakfast for us in front of the house. After some time, Mr. Akkerman's oxen arrived, and Brother Schmitt, assisted by our Hottentots, chose ten of them, for which, as they were picked, we paid what was asked, viz. two hundred and fifty dollars. Mr. Akkerman was satisfied to receive part of this sum in Gnadenthal knives, which, being a very saleable article, would leave him a further profit. The Hottentot, mentioned above, who had killed and skinned the tyger during our former visit, had not forgotten my promise to purchase the skin, in case he tanned it properly. It was well done, and a beautiful skin. I gave the poor fellow the sum he asked and richly deserved.

Lebrecht Aris being appointed driver of the new-purchased oxen, we set out. The road along the Kromm Revier, is a succession of ups and downs, on a sloping bank, which, in some places, renders travelling dangerous, on account of the sudden descent towards the river. The scenery is, in many parts, singular, and a few spots appear fertile, especially where the vale widens.

Mr. Mey's farm, our next station, lay at the head of the river, in a dreary glen. He is a German by birth. Mr. Melville was here, and having provided one spann of oxen, called to us to come down from the road, to see the place. The dwelling was miserable, with a carpenter's shop adjoining, but the people were friendly. No other spann arriving, we were obliged to employ the oxen we had purchased this morning. Among them were two or three, which never before had submitted to the yoke. They now expressed their objections to serve the lords of the creation, in a manner, that endangered the safety, both of our waggon and persons. But here, the superior courage and skill of Hottentots, in the treatment of oxen, were manifest. They would not hear of permitting the unruly beasts quietly to follow, but by dint of perseverance, at length brought them all to the yoke. Herein, they were assisted by the habits of the oxen themselves. Though they ran about, tossing their heads, and kicking furiously, and it sometimes seemed, as if they would escape altogether, yet they were made to return, by driving two or three tame ones after them, whom they immediately joined; when, taking no particular notice of the wild, and the tame ones being easily driven back to the waggon, the wild followed quietly, and were again caught, by passing a thong with a loop round their horns. Though they now threatened to run upon the person holding them, and more than once got loose, yet, by a repetition of the same stratagem, they were at length subdued, and stood still. When urged forward, feeling the yoke, they resisted so much, that the other spann was sent down to assist their refractory companions, and after much hallooing, cracking of whips, and lashing, the waggons were at length brought to the top of the hill.

By this delay, we did not reach Ellandsfonteyn, till long after sunset, but were received with civility by Mr. Piet Ferreira and his wife, and permitted to spread our bedding on the floor of the vorhaus, or hall.

28th. The poor German farmer, Mey, having witnessed the trouble we had with our oxen yesterday evening, of his own accord sent four tame, and, as they are here called, learned oxen, to our assistance, with which we proceeded, passing over the spot, where, on the 29th of March, one of our waggons overturned. We remembered, with thankfulness, the merciful preservation then experienced, and rejoiced with Brother Stein, that, except in some degree of weakness, he no longer felt the injury done to his arm. When we reached Olivier's farm, it was with difficulty, that we prevailed on Mr. Mey, to accept of some remuneration for the loan of his ~~beasts~~. I gave him a certificate for two spans, which he justly deserved, for without his assistance, we should not have been able to proceed with our own oxen, without much trouble and delay. Fresh oxen being soon procured, we passed by two farms in the Lange Kloof. At one of them, Brother Schmitt and I endeavoured to gain entrance, but a broad sheet of water prevented us. The people called out from the opposite side, desiring that we would come over with the waggons, but wishing to reach Kliphübel, before it grew dark, we thanked them for their kind offer, and pushed on as fast as our weary cattle would bear it.

On our arrival, we met with a very dry reception. Card-playing occupied the attention of the family, and an officer of dragoons, contrary to the general practice of the military, bestowed no kind of attention upon his countrymen. No invitation was given, nor any assistance offered. Pitching our tent upon the werft could not well be refused, but we were left to get fuel, where we could find it, and to cook our own victuals. Though, in general, we were most happy and independent in our tent, yet we could not but feel the affront as intended; and the night being very cold, it proved injurious to Sister Schmitt's health. Meanwhile, the Veldcornet's house rang with mirth and jollity. A miserable flute whistled in accompaniment to the heels of the merry party, the clatter of which disturbed our night's rest, almost as much as the tournament performed by the bull and his associates at Engelbrecht's, in Bruntjes Hoogte.

28th. While we were at breakfast, we had the honour of a visit from our ungracious host. He came with his pipe in his mouth, and squatting down on the ground, commenced a conversation on various subjects. But he seemed principally to wish to know, whether we had found a place, suitable for a settlement. He was told, that we had seen several, but fixed on none. He then surveyed the waggons, observed, that they were well constructed for a long journey, and made a great merit of putting us forward immediately, with two spans of cows. His slaves and domestics, by his own order, durst not take any notice of, or assist us, and the English officer afterwards pretended to say, that he had not known that Englishmen were on the werft, though he had spoken with both Mr. Melville and me.

CHAPTER XV.

Departure from Kliphiibel. Instance of persecution. Brutality of a boor. Avantur. Civility of Mr. Zondag and his family. Bushcats. Night's lodging at Veldcornet Rendsberg's. Eseljagd's Revier. Hartebeest-house at David Frie's farm. Runaway slave. Delay at Great Dorn Revier. Unsuccessful attempt in surgery. Saffran's Revier. Attaqua's Kloof. Caverns. Saffranskraal. German farmer and his baboon, at Groote Paerdekraal.

WE left Kliphiibel about nine o'clock, and found the cows to perform their duty with great alacrity. As we were passing slowly over a hill, we saw a woman making towards us, across the heath. When she reached the waggons, she appeared almost convulsed with weeping, and we could scarcely pacify her, so as to make her speech intelligible. She said, that she was the most miserable of beings, a slave, and sold by the Veldcornet, whom we had just left, to a neighbouring boor, because she went to hear the word of God. The boor himself was a moderate man, but his wife a most inveterate enemy of the gospel, who beat her slaves and dependants, if they showed any disposition that way. That, however, was not the worst, but her son and daughter-in-law, were likewise slaves to the Veldcornet, and to be sold on account of their love of religion, especially as her son spoke to the other slaves. They were to be separated from each other, the husband being disposed of to one, and the wife to another farmer, living at a distance from each other; that the thoughts of it made her distracted, and she spent her time running to and fro among the bushes, crying to God for mercy, but that, if she, or any other slaves, were found kneeling behind a bush in prayer, they were sure to be unmercifully treated. We spoke to her in as consoling a manner as we could, encouraged her to persevere in crying to the Lord for deliverance from such distress, and for the conversion of her mistress and other enemies of His word, and meanwhile to be faithful and diligent in her service. As she seemed to lay a great stress upon kneeling, and to think that the only posture of body, in which prayer could be made acceptably, we told her, that our Saviour was everywhere, and at all times present and ready to hear the cry, that proceeded from the heart, whether she was at work, in the house, or field, sitting or standing, or in any other attitude, and that no authority or circumstance could prevent the heart from holding communion with God; but that He had foretold His disciples, that they would be hated and persecuted for His name's sake. It must therefore be expected, and we have to look to Him alone, for that peace, which He promised to them in the midst of the tribulations of this world. The poor woman, seemed to take comfort, and to be truly in earnest, in seeking the salvation of her soul. By this circumstance, we gained some insight into the cause of our treatment last night, when we were shut out, as being engaged with missionary affairs, not to mention the inconvenience and disturbance, which might have been occasioned to the hop, by the intrusion of such grave faces. We reaped, however, a very essential advantage from Mr. F.'s aversion to such company, for he was the more ready to help us off his premises, and his cows carried us, with great speed, to a farm belonging to a Mr. H. The master being absent, we were very civilly treated by his black slave, and soon provided with two spans of oxen, to bring us forward to Mr. Zondag's farm, at Avantur.

During the short time of our stay at Mr. H.'s miserable place, Mr. Melville had the unexpected pleasure of meeting with an officer in the Cape regiment, who had been his school-fellow. Strolling about the premises, I noticed a trap-flur, better built, and larger than any I had yet seen. This is a circular piece of ground, surrounded by a low wall, and made as hard as a threshing floor, into which the corn is put, and the grain trodden out by from ten to twenty or more horses, driven round it in a sharp trot.

Whether this is a mode better calculated to secure the crop than thrashing, or a barbarous, wasteful custom, founded on prejudice, the straw being thus destroyed and lost, I leave better judges to determine.

All the other buildings in this farm were wretched huts, and the premises covered with filth, and the remnants of carcasses, as is too generally the case in this country. Yet the proprietor was possessed of what many English gentlemen cannot boast. He had been at the funeral of a neighbour's child, unfortunately burnt to death, and met us on the road in his state-waggon, drawn by six beautiful horses of equal size and colour, driven by himself. Instead of greeting us, he jumped off the box, and demanded of his black lad, what business he had to give us Vorspann. The poor slave had hardly time to reply, that he had acted conformably to his own commands, to furnish Vorspann in his absence, if ordered by the Veldcornet, when he put himself into a furious rage, attended with hideous grimaces, so as to make himself truly ridiculous, and threatening what he would do to his slave, when he got home, mounted his box, without paying any respect to our party, and drove off. The poor slave was exceedingly terrified, told us, that his master was a cruel tyrant, and would certainly give him a hard flogging on his return, with the achter shambock, the thickest whip cut out of the hippopotamus skin, and used to beat the shaft-oxen with. In passing, we called on the friendly family at Wellgelegen, who treated us with tea-water. Here we found a dark-coloured man, who travels about as a schoolmaster, to teach the farmers' children their letters and a little cyphering, spending a few weeks at a time at one place, then going to another, for the same purpose, there being no schools in the country. Of course, the proficiency made is very small, and hardly sufficient to qualify the scholars for the most common uses of reading, writing, and cyphering. To this want of instruction must be ascribed the general state of ignorance prevailing, with few exceptions, among the inhabitants of the interior. The schoolmaster was a very inquisitive man, and a shrewd politician.

By the specimens we had just seen of the behaviour of certain farmers in the Lange Kloof, we augured but unfavourably of the reception we were likely to meet with at Avantur, and afraid that we should be obliged to spend a cold, windy night, in our tent; but herein we were most agreeably dissatisfied. Nothing could exceed the cordial welcome we experienced from Mr. Zondag. He stood like an ancient patriarch before his door, and as we walked up to the house, held out his hand, inviting us in the most friendly manner, to enter, and make his house our home. His wife was worthy of him, and in the kindest manner received Sister Schmitt and the whole party. Perhaps their friendliness and hospitality was rendered the more conspicuous and gratifying, in contrast with the savage conduct of those we had left; but the general behaviour of the Zondags towards all persons in the house, proved them to have benevolent dispositions. The children, who were yet young, seemed to partake of the virtues of their parents, and behaved with unaffected good-will and confidence towards us. Two dragoons, entering the room, came up to us, shook hands, and, in lively terms, expressed their joy to see English faces, and hear their own language spoken. They were civil, well-bred young men. After much agreeable conversation, we were entertained by looking over a large Dutch bible, in folio, admirably well printed, and full of good cuts, which was valued as the chief jewel in the family. Little Peter, a favourite boy, was employed to read some portions of its contents, which he did well, but the want of schools in the country was much lamented by the parents. That we might be the better accommodated, Mr. and Mrs. Zondag, unknown to us, gave up their own room, and retired into the dragoons house to sleep. The latter went into the garret.

29th. We seemed in no great hurry to leave so agreeable a mansion, and did not set off till half past nine. Meanwhile all kind of business was carrying on. The slaves, and others wanted Gnadenthal knives, which brother Schmitt furnished. A dragoon gave me the skin of a bush-cat, shot a few days ago. This is a fierce, but beautiful animal, about three feet and a half long. It has a rougher skin, and a shorter tail than the tyger. Its general colour is a brownish-yellow. From the forehead along the back, three jet-black streaks run towards the tail; the sides are marked with large single spots of the same colour; the tail has five black rings, and each ear two streaks. Broad black bands descend a little way, in curved lines, down the shoulders. It generally climbs trees, watching for some unfortunate antelope or other creature to approach for shade, or near enough to be sprung upon. Perceiving that I was much pleased with the skin, Mr. Zondag's nephew brought me another still more beautiful, and well dressed. I inquired of the other dragoon, how I might reward his comrade for his generosity, for he had declined receiving any remuneration. He replied, that as he was "a great writer," but could get no paper, and was obliged to write on any odd scrap he could find on the premises, some paper would be most acceptable. I gave him half a quire of foolscap, and a few pencils and pens, with which he seemed extremely delighted. Sister Schmitt got here a supply of butter, apples, and other necessities, and we left this hospitable family with expressions of mutual esteem and affection. We were also supplied with excellent oxen, and Marcus, without much use of the whip, brought them frequently, on even road, into a sharp trot.

Our next stage was Jacomima Barkhuis's farm, on Kierboom's Revier. The family received us kindly, as old acquaintances, and as the old lady pleaded inability to furnish oxen, Mr. Zondag had permitted us, in that case, to proceed with his spans, to the house of the Veldcornet Michael Rendsberg, at Gaensekraal. We again entered the premises with some suspicion, lest we might be left to spend a cold night on the werft, but though the house was full of company, we met with a cordial welcome. The Veldcornet and his wife were remarkably attentive to us. Coffee was served, and the evening spent in lively and agreeable conversation between those who could speak Dutch.

An English dragoon, who had arrived from Kliphübel, told us, that the manner in which we were received in that place, had given much offence to our brave countrymen, but they durst not show their good-will towards us, without their officer's leave. From hence, we intended to go by the new-made road across the mountains to George, but heard, to our sorrow, that the landdrost, Mr. Van Kervel, had gone to Plettenberg Bay. We therefore resolved to take the nearer road, by Attaqua's kloof, and sent Johannes to George to bring the oxen we had left in that place, to the Gowritz river, where we should join the main road.

30th. After breakfast, Brother Schmitt was requested by Mrs. Rendsberg to deliver a discourse to their slaves and Hottentots, which he did on the words of our Saviour's parable; "Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in." He addressed both the Christians and heathen present, in a serious and impressive manner, for which, the ladies in the family more particularly expressed many thanks. The oxen furnished here were small and weak, and brought us forward but very slowly. We found ourselves encompassed with mountains of singular shapes, but, like the country through which we passed, barren in the extreme. Our dinner was cooked on the banks of the Eselsjagd river, or (Zebra-hunting river), which at present consisted only of a few stagnant pools. After quitting this place, we entered a narrow glen, bordered by ledges of rocks, bushes of various kinds, and Wageboom-trees, growing luxuriantly wherever any soil was left to support them. The large fragments of white quartz, covered in some places with vermilion-coloured moss, and the diversified tints, produced by the layers and masses of ferruginous sand-stone, intermixed with the foliage of the trees and bushes, gave to the whole a picturesque appearance. The road was very rough, till we emerged from the kloof and got into the Karroo-field, so called from its resemblance to the great Karroo. We had now the mountains on the north side of the Oliphant's river in view, with other ranges of higher or lower hills.

After a tedious ride through a flat country, covered with rhinoceros-

bushes, and here and there with aloes and Wageboom, we arrived at a farm called Plaisir, where the Veldcoronet had advised us to stop, if it were too late to reach Mr. Heyns's farm on Dorn Revier. As it was a light evening, we determined to proceed; and crossing the river, entered a kloof between low, heathy hills. It lightened much, and the road was very uneven; and perceiving, that we could not well reach Dorn Revier, we dispatched old Leonhard to a farm called Klippedrift, to announce our intention of honouring the proprietor, David Frie, with our company. The road to it was dreadfully bad, and in crossing a narrow ravine, with a deep brook at the bottom, we were in some danger of oversetting, but the good people came out with lights, to show us the way to the house. The farmer immediately gave us the only room he could spare, which was at one end of what is called a hartebeest-house, being a roof, put upon a wall about two feet in height. But the building, though very small, was new, and clean, with two bed-steads in it. Of these Brother and Sister Schmitt occupied one, I the other, and Mr. Melville the floor. Brother Stein put up with the only vacant spot remaining, under the bed-steads. But we were thankful to be under good cover. It lightened incessantly; and during the night a storm passed over us, with loud thunder.

May 1st. We rose early, the weather having cleared up, that we might reach Mr. Heyns's on Dorn Revier to breakfast. A runaway slave, chained to a post in the farmer's kitchen, was this morning sent forward to the drosty for punishment. He belonged to a place at some distance. In this manner, deserters are passed, from one farm to the other, till they reach the prison. We expressed to him our pity, and Brother Schmitt gave him some good advice, but he seemed quite stupified. The family behaved with great civility, and presented Sister Schmitt with a fine tortoise, and some eggs.

A pleasant morning's ride brought us to Great Dorn Revier; but no Vorspann having arrived, we were detained here all day. We found here a pleasant family, and spent the day in writing, drawing, and other useful employments. In the neighbourhood of this place, especially on some rocky hills to the south, many wild horses are yet seen. I obtained the skin of one, in barter for some gunpowder. A Koodoo-skin was likewise purchased for five rix-dollars. They are used for lashes, and sold at a much higher price near the Cape.

Brother Stein had here an opportunity of serving some of the family with medical advice, bled a black female slave, and attempted to extract a tooth, which had long tormented the mistress. But no sooner had he brought his instrument to bear upon it, than she pushed him away, leaving the tooth half-drawn; nor would she suffer him to finish his work, the bleeding of the lacerated gum having brought her some relief. No persuasion from her wiser husband could prevail, to let him make a second attempt.

Though the Vorspann system was sometimes attended with unforeseen delays, we generally contrived to make good use of our time, nor did the people at this place seem to wish to get rid of us. In the evening, the lightning was vivid all round the horizon. Our dormitory was a lumber-room, with a mud-floor, where we enjoyed a quiet night.

2d. After breakfast, we were glad to see two spans of oxen arrive for our use. The country through which we passed, was one continued waste, thickly covered with plants and bushes. Some species of the thorn-bush and speckboom were new to me. In two hours, we arrived at the Veldcornet Wolfran's farm, but made no stay. He came out to us, and gave us a letter to the farmer at Saffran's Revier to furnish us with fresh cattle, as his were too young and weak to take us through Attaqua's Kloof. But when we arrived at that place, the farmer pretended, that he had no oxen at home, though the dragoons informed us, that he had enough for five spans, but had driven them across the river, as soon as he saw our waggons coming down the hill. He seemed to be completely under the controul of his wife, a woman of a most surly temper, who, when her more hospitable daughter set a plate of apples before us, snatched them angrily away, and would hardly allow us to eat our own bread and butter under her roof. Mr. Barrow must have encountered many of that description, when he drew his picture of the African boors and their ladies. We met with but few, for in general, they treated us with civility.

Near this place, I found some very singular fossils in iron-stone, resembling screws, and in several places, the stones were covered with a bituminous crust.

We perceived now, that the best way would be, quietly to move on, and to endeavour to work our way through the kloof, with our weary oxen, as well as we could. Having reached the first steep ascent, we left the waggons, and by a foot-path, joined the road, on the other side of the hill. Here we rested long, before the waggons overtook us. Some curious caverns attracting our attention, we entered them. By some foot-marks in the sand, we perceived, that they afforded retreat to tyger-cats. They also provided shelter for travellers in rainy weather, there being here an outspann-place, and fire-places made under the overhanging rocks. Forgetting the caution I had prescribed to myself, when I touched a tarantula spider, on the Zuurberg, I lifted up a stone to examine it, and saw a young scorpion lying under it. I was thankful that I had escaped putting my hand upon it. Finding it impossible to reach any habitation to-night, the weather being very dark and cloudy, and seeing a fire on the mountain, we made towards it. It had been kindled by Lebrecht Aris, who had brought our purchased oxen thus far, and was preparing to rest here. We put up our tent, and though somewhat annoyed by passing mists, commended ourselves to the protection of God, and spent a very quiet night in this wild place.

3d. Brother Stein, thinking the morning about to dawn, at half past three roused us out of a sound sleep, and announced the day. Though unnecessarily disturbed, we took advantage of it, and prepared for our departure. When it grew light, we saw high peaked mountains to our left, and found ourselves in a romantic situation. It was six o'clock before we set off. As we proceeded, we were surrounded by rocky eminences of considerable height, and the views became still more interesting, especially when we reached the highest part of the kloof, where the mountains exhibited very singular scenery.

Mr. Melville and I were so long engaged in drawing, that we could not overtake the waggon, and were obliged to walk the whole way to the next farm, a distance of little less than ten English miles, Mr. Rutter, the proprietor of the Groote Paerdekraal, is a German by birth. His house lies about a field's length from the road, and both he and his wife received us most civilly. Indeed our visit seemed to put him into high spirits. Though seventy-five years old, he was remarkably strong and lively, and full of merry jokes. I felt at first much fatigued, but soon recovered. Our host came from the neighbourhood of Gotha in Saxony, and had been present at the building of the settlement of the Brethren in that neighbourhood, called Neudietendorf, of which he gave us an entertaining account, according to the notions he had formed of its institutions, though not quite like those of Madam de Stael. He related also some part of his own history, and the manner in which he had been decoyed at Amsterdam by a Dutch crimp, and brought at last as a soldier to the Cape. Our having noticed a tame baboon on his premises, led him to tell us the following story: Doing duty at the castle at Capetown, he kept one of these comical animals for his amusement. One evening, some boys and girls entered the place where it was confined, and played with it, unknown to him, till it broke its chain. In the night, climbing up into the belfrey, it began to play with and ring the bell. Immediately the whole place was in an uproar: some great danger was apprehended. Many thought, that the castle was on fire, others, that an enemy had entered the bay, and the soldiers began to turn out, when it was discovered, that his baboon had caused the disturbance. On the following morning, a court-martial was held, when Cape justice dictated, that whereas Master Rutter's baboon had unnecessarily put the castle into a state of alarm, its master should receive fifty lashes: "but," added he, "among these mountains, and under British government, I hope, that my boon and I may make as much noise as we please, without either of us endangering his back."

Brother Schmitt, struck with the general levity of this honest man's manner, began to speak seriously with him about his advanced age, and observed, that though he was blessed with such good health and flow of spirits, it was high time to think of the approach of death. He replied, that as to religion, he understood more about it, than all the people that travelled that way, and would immediately enter the lists with him, to prove, that the Lutheran faith was the right one. Having brought three or four quarto volumes from an adjoining room, he declared, that he had read them all through, and by them could settle any dispute. Brother Schmitt declined all dispute, and wished only to impress upon his mind the necessity of true conversion of heart and assurance of acceptance with God, through the merits of Jesus Christ. But the old man either would, or could not understand him, and turned the conversation to other subjects.

Our cattle were completely fatigued, and Mr. Rutter obliged us much, by sending for two spans, and putting us forward, without an express order from the Veldcornet. The road from the Groote Paerdekraal led through a very rough country, to the Haagekraal. That part of the mountains which will admit of any verdure, is well covered with it. Wageboom is frequent, and in other places, the sugar-bush, being now in full flower, adorned the slopes of the hills, with great splendor. At six we reached Haagekraal, and though the proprietors, Mr. and Mrs. Meyer, were not at home, their son gave us a hearty welcome. The night turned out windy and rainy, and we were again thankful to be under shelter.

Our driver Marcus, who had expressed much joy at our resolution to pass this way, as it would give him an opportunity of once more seeing his aged father, who was a hundred and four years old, was, to our sorrow, disappointed; being informed, that the old man and his wife were gone to see his sick sister, at the missionary institution at Hoogte Kraal, near George; but he spent the evening with another of his sisters, and her four children.

CHAPTER XVI.

Haagekraal. Account of wild horses. Gowritz Revier. Meeting with Johannes from George. Baboons. Irish hospitality. Klein Vat Revier. Turbulent housewife. Pass the farms of Messrs. Du Preez and Lombard. The family at Schlangen Revier going "op de tocht." Buntebock antelopes. Dangerous ford. Reach Zwelendam. Church-affairs. Mr. Koster, an independent missionary. Heavy rains. MAY 4th. The Haagekraal farm lies pleasantly on a green, surrounded by low hills, and watered by a large brook. The proprietor is brother to Mr. Meyer of Hartenbosch, near Mossel Bay, with whom we found such pleasant accommodations, (p. 189.)

We met here the son of our merry host at Groote Paerdekraal. Speaking of the singular situation of his father's house, he told some curious anecdotes of the wild horses in the Attaqua's Kloof. He once followed a young filly of that description, and had nearly come up with it, when he was charged with great fury by the wild stallion, and obliged to quit his horse. The stallion seized the horse by the mane with his teeth, and threw him down; but, satisfied with his victory, ran off with the filly. Both the wild horse, and even the quagga, are a match for the tame horse, but do not easily commence an attack. There are also ellands in the mountains; but, besides rehbocks and a few bushbocks, very little game is seen in the plain.

The rain, which still continued to fall now and then in drizzling showers, made the roads so slippery, that the oxen could scarcely drag the waggons up any ascent, and we were thankful that this weather had not overtaken us, while we were yet in the kloof. After a ride of three hours, through a dull and naked country, we descended into a glen called Hunykliff Kloof. On an eminence to the left, lies a farm, belonging to a German of the name of Krieg. He received us kindly, and insisted on our partaking of his dinner, which was just ready to be served up. Never have I relished a dish of bean-soup more, than in this forlorn place. To me it was quite new. This man had travelled through a great part of the north of Europe, and was at length persuaded, by some crimps at Hamburg, to enter into the Dutch East India Company's service. He described the situation of their sailors to have been most deplorable, and the attention paid to their health and comfort so deficient, that no less than one hundred and forty men had died on board the ship he served in, during the voyage. He was thankful to be released, by being left at the Cape in the sick-house, and by degrees recovering, his industry put him in possession of this erf, a name given to a small lot of ground, not being a complete farm. I purchased of him a hat, made by one of his slaves, of a water-plant called palmite, which was an excellent piece of workmanship. We left this hospitable cottage, about two o'clock, and continued our route through the glen, to the Gowritz river. Brother Schmitt, Stein, and I, walked to the farm-house, about a musket shot from the road, and found a friendly family at dinner, who immediately invited us to partake of their humble meal, but we had dined. They seemed to be poor people, and the object of our visit was not attained. We could purchase neither butter, fowls, eggs, nor a spann of oxen. The latter were dearer by five dollars per head than in Uitenhagen district. On reaching the banks of the river, we overtook

Lebrecht Aris with our new purchase, and on the other side, saw Johannes coming across the heath with the oxen, left at George.

He brought me a most obliging letter from Mr. Van Kervel, regretting his absence in Plettenberg Bay, and desiring, that if we returned by George, we would consider his house as our home. This he had left with the secretary, Mr. Stopforth, to be delivered to me at my expected arrival at George. The cattle-keeper had suffered our Gnadenthal oxen to stray, and Johannes was obliged to follow five of them as far as Kayman's Gat. Not far from us, on the steep bank of the river, between twenty and thirty baboons, large and small, sat watching our movements. Marcus approached towards them, cracking his long whip, when the old dams took up their young, some in their mouths, others on their backs, and all scrambled up the steep with astonishing swiftness. Some had one young one in their mouth, and another sitting on their backs.

The shores of the Gowritz river are covered with bushes, for about two miles in breadth. Many large aloes mixed with, and rising above them, showed their magnificent radiant crown of scarlet flowers to much advantage. In the evening, by moonlight, we reached Mr. Lombard's farm, where we meant to take up our night's lodging. We went to the house, in which we heard laughing, clapping of hands, and other tokens of merriment. Our humble knock was often repeated, before it procured us admission. Now general silence ensued. After giving a proper account of ourselves, we requested to know, whether we might have a room to sleep in, which was answered in the affirmative, yet with hesitation enough to prove, that we were not welcome guests. This was also plainly to be traced in the countenances of the women, who did not speak a word, but eyed us with fallen looks, as intruders, spoiling sport, and perhaps disturbing some family festivity. Hearing, therefore, that the Veldcoronet's house was only one hour's distance, and the moon shining bright, we determined to leave the merry party to enjoy their frolics, and drove off.

The women could not dissemble their joy at our departure, but dismissed us with a hearty horse-laugh.

We reached the Veldcornet's place about half past nine, and accidentally stopt at the dwelling of his partner, an Irishman, Mr. John Miller. Late as it was, he and his wife rose, and did every thing in their power to show, that we were welcome. Milk, dried peaches, eggs, and cold meat, were provided, and an empty room appropriated for our sleeping-place. Irish hospitality was exerted in full vigour, even here in South Africa; and if some of the Africans themselves were inoculated with it, it would do them no harm.

5th. After a quiet night's rest, we found oxen provided by the Veldcornet, got breakfast, paid a visit to the latter in his own house, and procured several articles of provision for ourselves and our Hottentots. Our Irish host left nothing undone, that he thought would be a benefit to us. He has lived twenty-five years in this country.

The mountains present here a very magnificent outline. They are crowned with rocks of singular forms. Nothing particular occurred, till we reached the Kaffre Kuyls Revier, where we halted on its banks. Some of us crossed the river, to visit the farmer, but he was absent, and his farm and mill in dirty plight. From hence, passing by the farm of Mr. Cobus Du Preez, we hastened to the Veldcornet's place on the Klein Vat Revier. Our reception by the men was civil, but the women behaved towards Sister Schmitt and our whole party with determined coolness. The mistress of the house had a most stentorian voice, and in ordinary conversation kept up a continual bawl. As the Veldcornet's brother possessed the same strength of lungs, the uproar was great, while she at one table, and he at another, were exerting their utmost powers to entertain their friends. It was a novel scene, and we retired into our chamber, stunned with the noise: but as it blew and rained hard all night, we were thankful for a room, even in an inhospitable dwelling.

6th. When we rose in the morning, no notice was taken of us. Sister Schmitt, for once, did not succeed, by her conciliating manners, in winning the affections of the turbulent housewife. The dragoons, quartered here, had a miserable hole to sleep in, and described the Veldcoronet's dislike of the English and of missionaries, to be very great.

Oxen having been ordered at the next station, we employed our two spans, both of which had arrived during the night, to convey us thither. The Hottentôts had again some trouble to make our young oxen submit to the yoke, but managed it with their usual dexterity. When subdued, they behaved well, and notwithstanding the rain had made the road, which was a greasy clay, almost as slippery as ice, they brought us, about noon, to the farm of our old friend, Mr. P. Du Preez. By the way, we remembered our breakfast in the vale of vultures, and several pleasant and useful conversations, which passed between us, about two months ago. We found a large party at the house, but not the worthy father of the family. His son received us kindly, and we were invited to dinner. The parents were gone to Zwellendam, to attend the sacrament.

A report having been spread, that the rivers had swollen, we hastened to cross the Duivenhocks Revier, at Mr. Lombard's farm, which we did, without any trouble. Calling on our old friend, Mr. Lombard, he and his family used all their eloquence to prevail upon us to spend the night at their house, but as it was yet early, and feeling impatient to get home, we made but a short stay; and passing by the next farm, reached a place on the Schlangen Revier after sunset, to which we repaired for lodgings, the night being cold.

The master of the house, having purchased a quantity of arrack from the wreck of the Arniston East-Indiaman, stranded on the coast near Cape Aguillas, was about to set off in the morning, on a trip into the interior, and to Graaf Reynet, to dispose of it, in barter for oxen and other articles of trade. They call this, going op de tocht. Two waggons were ready packed, into which the family had retreated, to be ready to start early in the morning. The house, therefore, was at our service, and indeed, but just large enough to hold us, without the family; for, besides a little dark kitchen, in which lay two or three slaves, it had only two rooms, not much larger than closets. William Sluiter's psalm-book lying on a shelf, and an old pewter coffee-pot, appeared to be the only moveables left in the house; for the few articles, which serve them at home, were also their travelling equipage. We did not see one of the family, to thank them for the use of their house, as they were yet fast asleep in their waggons, when we set out, before day-break.

7th. We passed through a country, where formerly that beautiful antelope, the buntebock, was found in great numbers. The destruction made among them has caused the Governor to prohibit the shooting of them, under a penalty of five hundred rix-dollars. They are therefore again multiplying, and we saw several of them, not far from the road. They are very stately-looking animals. Ostriches also made their appearance, and were followed, but without success.

The mountains, to our right, being by degrees disencumbered of clouds, afforded us a most agreeable prospect. About two o'clock, we reached Mr. Buissini's farm on the Bueffeljagd's Revier, and hoped to have been able to get to Zwellendam that night; but the river had swollen, and was not fordable. The people treated us with civility, and we spent the evening in a variety of useful employments. Mr. Melville, however, anxious to get home, and to meet his family as soon as possible, left us here, swam across the river with his horse, and proceeded through Zwellendam to Gnadenthal. The wolves howled dreadfully, and we were afraid, lest our oxen, running loose on the waste, might be attacked in the night; but on the 8th. Early, they were all brought safe to the yoke. On examination, the river had fallen sufficiently, to allow us to venture to ford it. For about a quarter of a mile in breadth, its banks are covered with thorn, and other bushes.

Every thing likely to suffer by wet, being put upon the seats of the waggons, we entered the river. The passage is not easily found by persons not acquainted with its bed, as, unless an island in the midst of the stream is doubled on the right side, there is danger of getting into deep holes and oversetting. We were rather under some apprehension, as to the strength of our cattle. The Gnadenthal oxen in the baggage-waggon were weak, and the new spann young, and not used to cross so large a river, the stream of which was very rapid and strong. Marcus also, having once, in crossing the Buffeljagds Revier, at this very place, overset, and lost seven oxen, expressed some fears; but by God's mercy, we reached the opposite shore in safety. Poor Rambler, our faithful dog, who had been our companion and pet, during this whole journey, happened to be left behind, but swam across, following the waggons by the same circuitous course round the island. For this exertion, he was rewarded with a larger portion of meat than usual. The weather continuing fair, we much enjoyed the view of the Zwellendam range of mountains, with their peaked, square, and round tops, deep gullies, and woody kloofs, which appeared to great advantage, illumined by a bright morning sun.

About noon we arrived at the drosty. The landdrost and his lady received us with their wonted kindness, and, by their hospitality, made us feel quite at home with them.

After dinner, we accompanied Mr. Buissini on a visit to the clergyman, lately appointed to this living, who but lately arrived from Holland. With him we went to see the church. It is a convenient building, in form of a cross, without a steeple. The organ, being but small, and out of repair, stood in the vestry. Government have not as yet done much towards the support of the ecclesiastical establishment in this colony, of which many complain, thinking it neither consistent with their usual liberality, nor with that union, which, under British dominion, exists between church and state. I believe it would tend much to conciliate, and stop the mouths of the disaffected, if the Government at home should think fit to authorize more assistance to be given towards its maintenance.

In the evening, Brother Schmitt was desired to deliver a discourse to the Hottentots and slaves belonging to the family; which he did, much to their edification. They expressed their gratitude in lively terms. The moon shone bright till midnight, when most unexpectedly, a storm of wind arose, black clouds covered the mountains, and the weather underwent a total change.

9th. Our generous host and hostess insisted upon our taking an English breakfast with them, before we left Zwellendam, though we felt rather in haste to get across the Breede Revier, before the heavy rain had swelled its waters.

Having received every possible mark of attention from the landdrost and his lady, we took leave about ten o'clock. In passing, we called upon Mr. Koster, who went out as a missionary under the direction of the Missionary Society in London, and had been both at Bethelsdorp and Latâkkun; but afterwards, with a view to a more independent maintenance, commenced business in this place as an apothecary and surgeon, and now supports himself and his family with credit; at the same time holding meetings with the Hottentots and slaves, and endeavouring to do the work he was called to, though no longer directed and supported by the Society.

It rained now so hard, that we made all haste to reach the Breede river. It is crossed by a ferry. The cattle, all but the shaft oxen, being unyoked, are driven into the river, and swim across. On landing, the road was rendered so slippery by the rain, that, with every exertion, ten oxen could not drag the waggon up the steep ascent, but frequently fell down. Both spanns were necessary to bring each waggon to the level. No attention seems to be paid to the road, which might very easily be cut down, so as to make the approach to the water more convenient. In the evening, we reached a farm near the Sonderend, belonging to a Mr. Heiman, where we met with a hospitable reception, being recommended by the landdrost. Our host had formerly been in the interior, and speaking of the wild buffaloe, mentioned a singular stratagem, practised by that fierce animal, when hunted in the woods. It runs forward, till it is out of sight. The huntsman follows its track, assured that the animal is before him. Meanwhile, entering the underwood, it returns part of the way, under cover of the bushes, waiting in ambush for its unwary pursuer, who finds himself suddenly attacked in flank, and sometimes loses his life in the conflict.

10th. We crossed the place, where, on the 7th of March, we had suffered so much from the heat, as to make us call it, the Hot Outspan, got fresh oxen at Veldcorneet Van Eckstein's, and reached the ford about two o'clock. The water was too deep to pass through it. The waggons, having been emptied of their loading, and empty casks placed within, to buoy them up, they were floated across. The oxen swam, and the travellers and baggage went over in a small boat. The weather favoured us, and we reached Mr. Van Helsland's hospitable mansion in the afternoon, without any harm to our goods by water or rain. His lady was gone to Capetown, but we spent a very agreeable evening in his company.

11th. Rising early, we walked for some time about the premises. The mountains present themselves here in all their grandeur, and on the spot, from whence I had before made a sketch of them, I undertook a revision, and endeavoured to trace their outline, and the many kloofs in them, with the most scrupulous exactness. Mr. Van Helsland made me attentive to a singular plant, called Vlachdorn, or Flat-thorn. Its leaves lie horizontally, close to the ground, forming a kind of star. They are studded with small thorns or prickles. From the centre issues a naked stem, ordinarily about a foot in length, with a small flower. Its root, like the roots of many plants and bushes in this country, is disproportionately thick, and strikes deep into the ground, like a carrot. A decoction of it is considered an efficient remedy against the stranguary in cattle, a distemper, of which many die, at a season of the year, when a certain herb, ripening among the common grass, is supposed to be the cause of it. Brother Schmitt knew it, as used by the Hottentots in the cure of similar disorders in man, but Mr. Van Helsland told us, that he had saved twenty oxen last year, who must otherwise have died of that terrible disorder.

About half past nine, we left Bock Revier, and proceeded with Mr. Eckstein's oxen to a place beyond Hartebeestkraal, where we again met our own. The mountains increase in singularity of shape, and picturesque combinations, the nearer we approach to Gnadenthal. When we had arrived in the neighbourhood of Mrs. Giebeler's farm, we saw about a hundred Hottentots on foot and on horseback, coming to meet us, headed by the missionaries Leitner and Lemmerz, with Mr. and Mrs. Melville and two children. It was truly affecting to hear the expressions of sincere joy and gratitude for our safe return, which burst upon us from old and young; and we all joined in humble thanks to God, our Saviour and Protector, whose mercies unto us during the whole journey, had been every morning new. About three o'clock we entered Gnadenthal, and the renewed impression made upon my mind, by the view of this charming place, accompanied by all the reflections on its origin, aim, and progress, filled my eyes again with tears of gratitude to God, for such a visible display of his mercy and power. While we were at dinner, a large company of Hottentots assembled before the dining-room, and sung a hymn of praise to the Lord, for having brought us safe home again. In the usual evening-service, the whole congregation joined in our thanksgivings.

MAY 12th. On our return to Gnadenthal, I found letters from England and from Capetown, which afforded me agreeable information concerning the well-being of my family and friends. A packet of letters from Labrador, which ought to have arrived before I went into the interior, was missing. Being Sunday, the services at church were as usual, and several parties of Hottentots, both men and women, came during the day to bid us welcome.

13th. In the afternoon, Brother Leitner accompanied me on a walk down the west-side of the valley, to see a place, formerly belonging to a Hottentot, Peter Batje. He had planted many fruit and other trees, and made a good garden on the premises. His wife was a woman of superior intellect, and an exemplary Christian, and kept the place in excellent order. After her death, he seemed to lose all his former good qualities, and took to drinking. No admonitions had any effect, and as his house and premises lay at some distance from the other dwellings, and in a by-path, leading to Robyntjes Kraal, young people of dubious characters, both Hottentots and boors, began to make it a place of rendezvous, and resorted to it at night, taking advantage of a situation, which eluded immediate detection. Thus it became a haunt of disorderly persons, and Peter received warning to quit. He refused to leave the place, and gave the missionaries much trouble. Notice was therefore sent to the Veldcoronet, who expelled him. Since that time, the premises have not been occupied, the missionaries fearing, that they might be turned to the same use, if let to improper persons, and the Hottentots being, in general, too poor to keep them in repair. We spent part of this day in conference.

14th. I walked with Brother Schmitt to the Caffre Kraal, and engaged a Caffre, Ernest Apolli, to tan and dress some tyger and other skins I had brought with me from the interior. This is done by spreading them on the grass, covering them with sheep's fat, strewing a species of chalk over them, and with a sand-stone, by a circular motion of the hand, rubbing them, till the skin becomes as soft and pliable as wash-leather. The hair remains undisturbed. Any laceration by shot or other violence, they contrive to mend with great neatness, so as hardly to be perceived.

I wrote to-day to Mr. Von Buissini, the landdrost of Zwellendam, in behalf of the poor, who cannot possibly pay the new poll-tax of five rix-dollars per man. The tax seemed to be levied without any discrimination, or proportionate distribution. I was the more anxious to do away any impression, unfavourable to the present Government, as I have, to my sorrow, perceived in the minds of many people in the interior, considerable alienation from that attachment to the English, which, in the beginning, seemed sincere, but has suffered much, probably from misapprehension, as they are not acquainted with English forms, nor easily turned from their old customs. I have been credibly informed, that there is not much difference as to the amount of their contributions towards the public expenditure; but they have very imperfect ideas of commutation.

15th. and 16th. Mr. Melville had kindly undertaken to make a correct plan of the whole settlement of Gnadenthal, which he executed in the most finished manner, with uncommon accuracy and neatness.

17th. A boor, whose house is not far off, and a sink of every abomination, came to Gnadenthal on business. Father Marsveld addressed him on the diabolical delight he finds, in seducing our unsteady young people to drunkenness, and the commission of all manner of lewdness, when at work at his farm. He is said to live in his cellar, to be near to his idol, the brandy-cask, and seldom sober. He had not a word to say in his own defence, but immediately quitted the place.

This morning we desired the five Hottentots, who had accompanied us into the interior, to inform us, what reward they expected for their trouble. Their remarks would have done credit to the most disinterested and generous-hearted Europeans. As it was but just, that they should reap the benefit of their labours, and be recompensed for their uniform good behaviour, by which they did honour to their Christian profession, we gave them about as much again as the sum, with which they had declared themselves satisfied, not wishing to take advantage of their willingness to serve a good cause, exerted at the expense of the duties they owed to their families.

In the evening, we met, to confer about a proposal, made by the Hottentots themselves, in consequence of the disorders before alluded to, which in so large a settlement cannot be prevented, without strict attention and watchfulness. It may be supposed, where there are many young people, that not all of them are willing to tread in the steps of their Christian parents, but rather disposed to follow the ways of the world, and to give free vent to their unruly passions. To keep them in order had sometimes proved a very difficult task to the parents, who were unable to defeat the attempts, continually made by unprincipled white people, and others, to entrap the unwary.

During my journey into the interior, several chapel-servants had waited upon Father Marsveld, who, by common consent, acts the part of Justice of the Peace in the settlement, and expressed a wish, that a company of Brethren might be appointed, to maintain order throughout the village. This was particularly necessary during the evening-services, and at night, to prevent slaves and others, who have no business here, from entering the houses, and keeping company with the idle and dissolute.

The Hottentots proposed, that the missionaries should chuse men, approved for their good behaviour, and respected by the people in the village, to be nominated opzieners, (overseers). They should then mention to the chapel-servants the names of those, whom they had chosen, when they would acquaint their teachers with the general opinion, conceived of each. As they had appealed to me, I approved and recommended the measure. A list was then prepared of fifty-four men, chiefly fathers of families, acknowledged to be capable of holding such an office. The Hottentots had also suggested, that the deputy-landdrost of Caledon, Mr. Von Frauenfelder, should be requested to give his sanction to such a regulation of police. Though we always expect tares to grow up with the wheat, yet we may trust, that such exertions may be made, as will, by the Lord's mercy, keep them down, and prevent their choking the good seed.

19th. Brother Schmitt preached, and in the evening, both he and Mr. Melville, with their families, set out on their return to the Cape. A large party accompanied them to the Sonderend.

I was this afternoon present at the baptism of three children, of from one to three years old. It was conducted nearly in the same manner as that of adults. At night I felt unwell with a violent cold, and on the 20th, for the first time, did not rise at the stroke of the bell, nor attended the service in the chapel. The greatest anxiety was shown on the part of the missionaries, that nothing might be neglected for my relief. To Sister Leitner I owe the benefit I received from a decoction of elder-flowers and bukku-leaves, used here to promote perspiration.

24th. Having made a report of the before-mentioned plan of appointing overseers (opziener) to the deputy-landdrost, Mr. Von Frauenfelder, I received to-day a very satisfactory answer from him, fully approving of the measure, and promising every assistance in his power.

25th. Though I still felt the effects of the cold, yet I persevered in taking my usual walks, and to-day went, with Brother Lemmerz, to the top of the lower hills behind the Caffre Kraal, from whence the chief part of the stones, used in laying the foundation of the new house, had been brought. They are strongly impregnated with iron. Large blocks lie scattered all over these hills, some covered with a lichen of a deep vermilion-colour. We proceeded towards the foot of the great mountain, hoping to reach a stony kloof to the eastward of it, but were obliged to return, for want of time. By the way, we called at some Hottentots' houses, and conversed with the inhabitants. In the afternoon, we rode to the Sonderend, where I made a sketch of the view of the high range, and the approach to Gnadenthal from the ford.

26th. To-day, thirty-two of the fifty-four men appointed to be overseers, met, the remainder being engaged at the farms. They were addressed by Brother Leitner, and the nature of the commission, with its responsibilities, explained to them. They declared themselves willing to accept of it, and several of them spoke, with much good sense, of the necessity of providing for the maintenance of order in so large a place. Father Marsveld represented to them, how careful they ought to be, in accepting of, and holding this office, that their own lives and conversation should exhibit proofs of real conversion of heart, that what they recommended and required of others, might be enforced by good example. The letter addressed to me by the deputy-landdrost of Caledon was then read and explained, and they expressed great thankfulness for the countenance to be given them by the magistrate. I received, to-day, a letter from the landdrost of Zwelendamd, Mr. Von Buissini, in which he generously accedes to my wishes respecting the poor at Gnadenthal, granting them certain exemptions, and directing in what manner the declaration of their disabilities must be made to the collector of taxes.

In the following days, I was busily engaged at home with writing letters, and business relating to the Mission.

29th. I had been requested to draw up rules or statutes, to be read to the congregation, at stated times, and particularly to new people, that they might know what was required of every one, who desired to become and remain an inhabitant of this place. For this purpose, I had a conversation with all the missionaries, and heard the remarks of each, made on every subject, connected with the internal and external state of the settlement. From these, and from the regulations of the settlements of the Brethren in Europe, as detailed in Loretz's Ratio Disciplinæ Fratrum, I compiled a set of rules, suited to the peculiar circumstances of this Mission. Having received the approbation of the missionaries, they were communicated and explained, first to the company of overseers, and afterwards, to the whole congregation, and agreed to with thankfulness. All promised obedience to them, and some, who had not understood every particular instruction, in the following days came to ask explanation, to which they had been invited by the missionaries. I was pleased with the simplicity and confidence many of them showed on this occasion.

30th. I took a walk to the hill behind the Beestkraal, from whence a good view of the church, the missionaries' gardens, the burial-ground, the kloof, and the great mountain, presents itself. While I was making my sketch, clouds came rolling from the north, through the kloof, and enveloped the lower region of the mountain, the different peaks on its summit appearing above them. I wished for a better artist to give a faithful representation of the majestic scene, which, however, I ventured to do, in a correct outline.

31st. For some time the oaks, poplars, and other foreign trees, had exhibited a beautiful variety of the richest autumnal tints, but to-day, the heavy rain and wind caused a great falling of the leaves, and, in a few days more, winter seemed to have assumed its reign.

This afternoon, a young man, Francis H. was brought before us, to answer for his having struck another man's wife. He was expected to be very sulky, but confessed the charge, without an attempt to defend himself, and heard the sentence of exclusion from the meetings of the baptized people, with many tears. He was apparently not able to speak for grief, and it was with great reluctance that he retired, when dismissed. On such occasions, I generally remained a silent hearer, and found much to approve and admire in the manner, in which Father Marsveld administered justice. But after Francis was gone, I took the liberty to observe, that, though he had confessed the charge brought against him, the party offended had not been present, to be examined respecting the occasion given for the offence, when probably some circumstances might have been discovered, which would have caused the sentence to be less rigorous. It is not in the manner of the punishment, that its severity is felt, so much, as in the effect produced in the mind or feelings of the person receiving it. Most of the Christian Hottentots, negroes, or other converts from among the heathen, in our missionary settlements, would rather endure any corporeal chastisement, than be excluded from the meetings of their class or division in the congregation. The missionaries, acknowledging the truth of these remarks, appointed a second hearing in Father Marsveld's room, in presence of two or three of their number, and a summons was sent to the woman, to meet the accused in the morning.

June 1st. They both appeared before us. Here again I was witness to that great influence, which the missionaries will ever possess over the minds of their converts, while the latter are convinced, that all they do and direct, is meant only for their good and that even the severest reproofs proceed from the sincerest regard for their welfare. We now obtained a true account of the transaction, which, though in itself of small consequence, I relate, as an instance of the manner, in which affairs of this nature are treated in our settlements.

By a rule long established, every inhabitant is bound to make good the damage done by his cattle in his neighbour's grounds. To prevent such mischief, they are continually exhorted to keep their hedges and other fences in repair; the neglect of which operates against the complainant in awarding damages. The husband of this woman had suffered his horse to enter Francis's garden, and do considerable mischief. Francis complained, and the man agreed, that, to compensate for the damage done, he should have twenty or thirty cabbages, with which he was satisfied. On coming to claim them, he found the best of them cut off and carried away. He entered the house, and found only the wife at home, who answered to his remonstrance, in a manner so affronting, that he gave the woman a push, not a blow, according to her own admission, when some high words passed between them. On cross-examination, the woman confessed, that, hearing the bargain made between her husband and Francis, she had thought it no harm, to save as much of her husband's property as she could, and therefore secured the best cabbages. The injustice of such deceitful conduct being represented to her, and that she deserved to be excluded, as well as Francis, she seemed terrified, and offered to make any reparation in her power. They were then, after some further exhortation, asked, whether they could heartily forgive each other. This they did with great sincerity, shaking hands, promising never more to remember the offence given. The sentence, passed on Francis yesterday, was now revoked, and both expressed their thanks with great humility.

2d. Whitsunday. The services usual on this festival-day, were attended by the families of some farmers in the neighbourhood, and a large audience of Hottentots and slaves. In the evening, the Holy Sacrament was administered to about three hundred and fifty communicants.

This was the last time I was favoured to be present, and to assist at this sacred ordinance, in the church at Gnadenthal. When I entered and took my seat, and beheld the congregation sitting before me, in silent expectation of that great blessing, which attends the celebration of this sacramental feast, instituted by our Lord himself, in remembrance of His sufferings and death, I felt quite overwhelmed, and almost totally lost in contemplation. Nor were my feelings free from pain, when I reflected, that, in a few days, I must leave this place and people, duty requiring, that I should not much longer indulge in the delight my abode at Gnadenthal had afforded to my mind, but proceed to Groenekloof, where I had more business to transact, than at this place.

I could not help drawing a comparison between the condition of these Hottentots, and that of the poor, squalid, and ignorant wretches I had seen, during my late journey. And these had been in the same state, but for the preaching of the Gospel. If this be not a miracle, wrought by the power of God alone, I know not what is!

Effects so striking may prove to all men, that it is not by enticing words of man's wisdom, nor by any human systems and contrivances, but by the preaching of the cross of Christ, in demonstration of the Spirit, that the heart of man is changed, and he is made a new creature. And, as I humbly hope, that, through the mercy of God, I have been taught to believe in Jesus, as my only trust and refuge in life and death, my faith was greatly strengthened, and my mind filled anew with assurance, that we are doing right, in determining "to know nothing amongst men, save Christ Jesus and Him crucified." Yet I do not wonder, that some good men reprove us for dwelling too much on this subject. Its effects are not to be explained by the common rules of reasoning. Experience alone can justify the practice, as consistent with the will and wisdom of God.

Even to these poor Hottentots the words of St. Peter may be addressed: "Ye are come into Mount Zion, and to the city of the living God, and to Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling,"

Though despised by most men, and often liable to err and fail, yet, as received and reconciled by Him, with whom there is no respect of persons, I felt myself unworthy to serve this congregation, whose attentive, devout deportment, and unaffected fervency of spirit is scarcely equalled in any Christian community.

3d. As Whit-Monday is celebrated in this colony, as in most parts of the continent of Europe, the usual service was performed at the church. In the afternoon, two adults, and two children, were baptized.

After this solemnity, the chapel-servants came in a body to pay me a visit. Brother Leitner being interpreter, I had some very agreeable conversation with them. In the evening, the opzieners met, by appointment, in our dining-room, when the rules or statutes mentioned (p. 276,) were again read and explained. The remarks showed much good sense, and confirmed the opinion I have already conceived of the Hottentots, that they are, in general, more sensible, and possess better judgment, than most Europeans equally destitute of the means of instruction.

4th. Having heard, that I intended next week to leave Gnaden-thal, the Hottentots, both men and women, alone, or in parties, came to take leave of me, or rather to beg me not to leave them. Some said: "You seem so much at home among us, that you had better go and fetch your wife and children and take up your abode in this place." I replied, that I thought I could do them more service by going to England, and reporting to my Brethren, what I had here seen and heard of the effects of the gospel, which would excite them to send out more teachers, to instruct those of their nation, who were yet in darkness. When they perceived, that nothing would prevail to detain me, many shed tears, saying, that as they must now return to the farms, they should see me no more.

Their behaviour towards me has, indeed, from the beginning, been most kind and affectionate, and if I happened not to be in my place at church, which, however, occurred only two or three times, their inquiries after my health were continued for three or four days successively. I was engaged part of this day with Brother Beinbrech, who has the charge of the cutlery and smithy. Fourteen Hottentots were employed in these branches of business. Their busy hammers, files, and polishing-wheel, made me often fancy myself living in a London street, and forget, that I was in a part of Africa, but lately a horrid and lonely desert. Room being wanted, both for stores and family use, some arrangements were made, which were rendered practicable by the building of the new house, to the satisfaction of all parties.

This being the birth-day of our venerable sovereign, we remembered him in our prayers, according to the direction given by the apostle, 1. Tim. ii. 2, with thanksgiving, that under him, and a Government, disposed to promote the interests of religion and virtue, we may lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty.

5th. A Hottentot, Philip Appell, who had returned from the interior, was summoned before Father Marsveld and three other Brethren, to be informed, that he could not be permitted to live at Gnadenthal. This was a new case, which involved a difficult question.

Philip had formerly belonged to the congregation, and, for some time after his baptism, conducted himself with propriety. His wife was a woman of a very turbulent spirit, and had held her former husband in complete subjection. When she married Philip, she made several attempts to treat him in the same manner; but after long patience, he at length sought his remedy in his superior strength, and every now and then their house was a scene of confusion and uproar. Added to this, they both began to indulge in liquor, and exhortations being fruitless, he was ordered to quit the settlement. His first expulsion seemed to produce within him, a show of sincere repentance, and he was so earnest in his entreaties for admission, and promises of amendment, that he was permitted to return. This happened twice. But when he fell a third time into the same transgression, he refused to depart, and became a terror to the peaceable inhabitants. The missionaries had now no means of ridding themselves of such disturbers of the public peace, but by an application to the landdrost. That magistrate was very ready to lend his aid, and ordered Philip instantly to leave Gnadenthal, and not to enter the settlement within a twelvemonth, on pain of imprisonment. But this was not the intention of the missionaries and their congregation, who dreaded his return. Whenever the subject occurred in conversation, Father Marsveld, knowing the character of the man, assured us, that on the very day, on which the year of his banishment was completed, he would make his appearance; which he did accordingly, furnished with a handsome testimonial from the farmer, by whom he had been employed.

Though I had heard much to his disadvantage, I could not help admiring the address of this Hottentot. He was a man of superior intellect, great bodily strength, six feet high, and had an imposing appearance. To Father Marsveld's just and severe representation of the wicked conduct both of himself and his wife, disgraceful to the Christian name given him in baptism, hurtful to the youth in the congregation, annoying in the extreme to all the inhabitants, he made a reply, full of confession and contrition, not pretending to defend himself, but only craving mercy, patience, and another trial, with so much eloquence, that to us, who were novices in these things, he appeared truly sincere, and deserving of attention. We were rather surprised to hear Father Marsveld answer, with unrelenting severity, to the following effect: " This speech we have now heard a third time, not one word of which we can admit to be true. " Do you mean a third time to deceive us with hypocritical pretences " and professions, which proceed not from your heart, but are made " for your own convenience; because you feel the effect of the dis“ grace you have incurred with your own people, and throughout “ the whole country, by your abominable practices, which you now “ seek to wipe off, by being again received as an inhabitant of “ Gnadenthal? But your contrivances are vain. You are dreaded “ by the whole congregation, and there are few, who would for“ give us, if we were to admit so dangerous a man to dwell in this “ place; out of which, drunkenness, lewdness, brawling and fighting, “ shall, by God’s blessing upon our present regulations, be totally “ expelled, together with every one, who does not chuse to lead “ a life, consistent with Christian principles.” I thought it was all over with Philip, whose countenance showed the deepest conviction and humility. But I was mistaken. He granted every word the venerable missionary had spoken, to be true, and that he deserved to be suspected of falsehood and pretence, but proceeded to make such protestations of his sincerity, and the remorse he felt, on account of his former transgressions, that Father Marsveld, perceiving by our looks, that we were disposed to relent, ordered Philip to withdraw, that we might consult together in private. He then observed, that he did not wonder at our being moved by the Hottentot’s speech, since we were yet unacquainted with that particular character, but that, if a real change was wrought in the man’s heart, it would appear to him one of the greatest miracles he had ever heard of, or seen. The result was, that Philip was permitted to stay till Monday, when we should inform him of our decision. Meanwhile, the opzieners were convened, and the case laid before them. The missionaries supposed, that they would unanimously protest against his re-admission, when, to our surprise, they all pleaded for a third trial. We afterwards discovered, that Philip had informed himself of their appointment, and waited upon each, when, by his penitential declarations, he had quieted their minds and moved their compassion.

On Monday morning, he appeared before us, to hear our determination, being directed to bring his wife with him. She was addressed by Father Marsveld in a suitable manner, but looked very sulky, and made no reply. Philip then spoke to her in our presence, confessing his own sins, and that he had often provoked her bad behaviour, by his conduct, asked her pardon, and exhorted her to take warning, and to pray to God to convert her heart, that they might in future avoid giving such offence to a Christian people, and such pain to their teachers. She seemed to relent, and promised obedience and submission to the rules of the place. They now obtained leave to erect a hut, and cultivate some garden-ground, to be appointed for them by Brother Leitner, but were told, that for the first breaking out of their former warfare, or the first symptoms of drunkenness and disorder, they would be expelled by the landdrost, never more to return. As long as I remained in Africa, no complaint was made against them, nor have I heard any since my return, and we may hope, that the professions of Philip Appell have been sincere, and, by the grace of God, evinced their reality. He seemed particularly thankful to me, though I had not interfered much in pleading his cause, and he accompanied me for several miles, when I left Gnadenthal.

On this occasion, I could not but again notice that easy flow of speech so natural to many Hottentots, and which is indeed increased by Christian instruction; but, if not directed by the Spirit of truth, may make a Hottentot, even without genuine conversion of heart, appear qualified to preach to, and teach others. Great caution ought therefore to be applied, if it be thought proper, consistent with convenience or other considerations, to appoint any of them to that office. Hitherto the Brethren have not employed either Hottentots or negroes as assistants in the ministry, but only as visitors and chapel-servants.

6th. Having discovered the man who was the chief instigator of the uncasiness of the Hesqua people, in wishing to appoint a Captain of that tribe, in opposition to Captain Koopman, who is regularly appointed by Government, he was summoned and examined as to his late proceedings at Capetown, where he had waited on some members of the Government, and endeavoured to obtain the Captain's staff for his tribe. We told him, that, had he obtained it, he should immediately have quitted the 'settlement, and might have exercised his authority among the wolves and jackals, the only inhabitants at present in the Hesqua Kloof, where formerly that tribe had its residence. That, also, the first disturbance he should occasion, would be punished with expulsion. After much prevarication, he was brought to confession, and promises of his future peaceable demeanor.

7th. I visited the girls' school, and heard some of them read very well. Dr. Bell's plan is followed as much as possible, but not in all its parts. Some have made tolerable progress in writing.

In the afternoon, I rode with Brother Lemmerz, across the Sonderend, to a hill beyond Badenhorst's farm; where I made a drawing of the approach to the Gnadenthal valley. The river was so much swollen, that it was impossible to ford it, without being wet.

As the time of my departure drew near, the farewell-visits of the Hottentots became more frequent, and many parties of men, women, and children, followed each other during the day.

In the evening, captain Koopman and two other Hottentots paid me a formal visit. They began the conversation, by expressing the regard and affection they felt for me, and their sorrow for my departure. Having made portraits of the two venerable Fathers, Marsveld and Schwinn, which lay on my table, they immediately knew them, and seemed delighted to see them "written down on paper." Captain Koopman then said, that he had still something to observe about the land belonging to the Hottentots, in consequence of my having lately asserted, "that the land was given by Government to the Brethren, for the Hottentots, and that, if it had not been for the Mission, the Hottentots would have lost it all." He entered into a long demonstration to prove, that not only this land, but two neighbouring farms, which he named, had, in old times, been Hottentots' land, being secured to one of his ancestors, by some Dutch Governor, but to which ancestor, and by what Governor, he could not tell. He added, that there was now not land enough for pasture, and that if, according to my recommendation, still more were to be brought under tillage for fields and gardens, they must keep fewer cattle, and that, if those spots, which appeared fit for the rearing of corn, were ploughed and sown, they would be surrounded by pasture-ground, and the produce trodden down by beasts.

He therefore wished me to apply to the English Government, to restore to the Hottentots the two farms in question. Brother Leitner being interpreter, I explained to him, that the English Government must and would act justly; that they had already greatly favoured the Christian Hottentots; that what I said about the land being given "to the Brethren," for the Hottentots, was strictly true, for they had the right granted them of giving it to, or withholding it from, any Hottentot, at their discretion; and that the occupation of it by the Brethren, as landlords, was the only sure way of preserving it for the use of the Hottentots; for he must know, that but for the English Government, not only the two farms he mentioned, but Bavians-kloof itself, would have been seized upon by some white landholder. Moreover, that the English Government could not in justice dispossess the farmers of their property, unless by purchase, which could not be expected. Brother Leitner then showed, that the Brethren had spent above a thousand rix-dollars, in securing land for the Hottentots, and could do no more, since they received no interest or benefit whatever from it.

With these explanations they appeared quite satisfied, but added some very sensible remarks on the present degraded state of their countrymen, who lived with the boors, since all the country had been taken from them, and was possessed by intruders, I endeavoured to make them understand, "that though I by no means meant to justify such encroachment and robbery, yet they might, as Christian people, find some consolation in the reflection, that, had it not been for the occupation of their country by Europeans, they would have remained in gross ignorance and darkness, and been 'led captive by Satan at his will,' in the service of sin; the consequence of which, even to the richest and most powerful nation, was misery both here and hereafter. We then explained to them the state of the negroes in the West Indies, who had not only lost their land and liberty, but were carried as slaves into a foreign country; and yet many of those, who had received the gospel, now rejoiced in that, which, to man, seemed the greatest misfortune, because it had been the means of preparing them, by faith in Jesus, for the possession of an inheritance incorruptible and eternal." They heard us with great attention, and, during the latter part of the address, tears filled their eyes, and they declared their thankfulness to God for their present privileges; adding, that in conversation among themselves, they frequently reminded each other of these benefits.

It was to me a most interesting discovery, showing, that these poor people likewise reason about the rights of man, though with rather more coolness and good sense, than some among our English demagogues have done.

8th. To-day I was much engaged in making preparations for my departure, and finished a farewell-address to the congregation, in Dutch, which I meant to read to them on Sunday. For though I had learnt to read and pronounce this language tolerably well, I could not venture to speak extempore in a public assembly. I read it on the 9th, in the afternoon, to a crowded audience, and was glad to hear, that it was well understood by the Hottentots. When I had finished, and left the desk, Father Marsveld addressed the congregation, and offered up a prayer in my behalf.

The pain felt at parting was, I believe, mutual; nor would my feelings have suffered me to read my speech, had I not been obliged to pay as much attention to reading and right pronunciation, as to the subject itself.

During the whole day, parties of Hottentots came into my room, to express their affection, thanks, and good wishes.

10th. The weather being rainy, and every prospect of the rivers in the high mountains being impassable, I gave up my intention of going to Groenekloof by Rodesand and Tulbach.

The missionaries Clemens and Leitner, with Sister Leitner, having resolved to accompany me to Groenekloof, our departure was fixed for the following morning. But hearing that it was no longer possible to pass the ford of the Sonderend, I confess I felt pleased with the prospect of delay; for my regret at leaving Gnadenthal and its worthy inhabitants, was hourly on the increase.

In the evening, the family met to take leave of me. I endeavoured, as well as I was able, to express to all, and each of them, the grateful sense I had, and shall ever retain, of the undissembled brotherly love and confidence which I enjoyed during my abode in this place, as likewise my view of the present state of the Mission, and my heartfelt, fervent, and never-ceasing desire and prayer, that a special blessing might rest upon the labours of each of the Brethren and Sisters employed in it, both now and in succession. Brother Clemens, the warden, in the name of all the missionaries, answered me in a most affectionate address. Of this last evening at Gnadenthal, I spent part with Father Schwinn, and part with Father Marsveld, in pleasant and profitable conversation.

The state of Father Schwinn's health was very precarious. It did not appear, as if we should much longer enjoy the services of this faithful labourer in the Lord's vineyard. Father Marsveld was above seventy years old, and begins, in various ways, to feel the infirmities of age, but his spirit is lively, and both his fellow-labourers, and the Hottentots, prayed that he might be preserved in health and activity many years longer.

JUNE 11th. I did not feel quite well, and had almost given up the hopes of being able to set out this morning, on account of the reported fullness of the Sonderend, when Solomon Pfeiffer, who had been sent to examine the state of that river, returned with the news, that it might be forded with great ease. We therefore prepared for the journey.

After I had paid an early visit to the two venerable Fathers, Marsveld and Schwinn, in their rooms, the family breakfasted together in the dining-hall, and once more commended me and my fellow travellers to the grace and protection of God, in a short prayer by Father Marsveld.

Meanwhile, about two hundred Hottentots had assembled in the grove. All would press forward, and their eagerness once more to shake hands and bid me farewell, was so great, that a general scramble was avoided only by my calling to them, that I would not pass by any one, but admit them all in due order. At length we reached and entered the waggon, when they began, with one voice, to sing their farewell-hymn.

At this moment, I felt all resistance to my feelings give way. Never have I experienced a keener pang, on leaving any place, or any friends, to whom I was attached. Gnadenenthal is indeed a spot, where I have found myself so much at home, and where almost every object conspired to fill my mind with grateful remembrances and contemplations, that, though convinced of my duty to proceed to Groenekloof, where business of importance to that settlement demanded my presence, I found it necessary to do violence to my feelings, to tear myself loose. But my spirit will often dwell in those hallowed groves, accompany the congregation into the house of prayer, attend them during their truly solemn assemblies, behold with affection and delight the pious labours of our teachers, participate in their joys, their sorrows, and their cares, and enjoy an aftertaste of the heavenly comfort attending the administration of the holy sacraments, by the presence and power of our Lord and Saviour.

The whole missionary family, and about a hundred and fifty Hottentots, small and great, on foot or on horseback, accompanied us beyond the Sonderend, as far as Badenhorst's farm, where, placing themselves in a semicircle, they sang another farewell-hymn, and finally bade adieu. The Brethren Thomsen and Lemmerz kept us company, till we arrived at Mr. Klemm's, on Serjeants Revier.

The Gnadenenthal range of mountains was covered with snow, upon which the sun shone with great splendor. We reached the Warmbaths about five in the evening, but to our sorrow, found our good friend, Dr. Hassner, very ailing. His spirits, however, revived, and we spent a pleasant evening at his house.

12th. In the morning, the doctor was better. He had met with a serious loss, by the death of a slave, who, besides being a useful and sensible servant, was a good joiner, and cost him three thousand rix-dollars. The poor fellow seems to have been seduced to take too much liquor, fell from his horse into a ditch, and broke his back.

After breakfast we set out, and called upon Mr. Von Frauenfelder, the deputy-landdrost of Caledon. He was glad to hear our report of the new regulations at Gnadenthal, and to relieve the poor of that place, by a direction from Mr. Von Buissini, who had most kindly attended to my representation.

The landdrost delivered to me a letter from Colonel Bird, just arrived, in answer to my application made to his Excellency the Governor, for the possession of the land on the Witte Revier, which is granted, in terms most obliging.

Our next visit was to the Rev. Mr. Voss, the minister of Caledon. He shewed us the church, which is a good, plain building, and gave us some information respecting Messrs. Read's and Williams's visit to Caffraria, where they seemed to have met with encouraging success.

From hence we proceeded to Bontjeskraal. On an eminence near the farm, I found a fine view of four ranges of mountains, those of Gnadenthal, the Zwarteberg near Caledon, the Tower of Babel and its companions, and the Great and Little Haue Hoek. Our road, from this place to Mr. Servas de Kok's farm on the Botte Revier, lay over a barren waste. He received us dryly, but gave us a good supper, good beds, and in conversation was friendly.

13th. We set out early, and forded the Botte Revier without difficulty. Formerly, rocks rendered this fording-place almost impassable, but about a year ago, by a sudden inundation, earth and sand was carried down from the mountain in such quantities, that the rocks were covered, the holes filled up, and a good road made through the river. Mr. de Kok, however, was a great sufferer. His vineyards were completely ruined, the water-course and mill destroyed, and the well, which supplied the family, choked up.

In about an hour, we reached the toll-house, at the foot of the Haue Hoek, over which we had a pleasant walk of about three English miles, the morning being remarkably fine. We halted at Mr. Urie's farm. While dinner was preparing, we walked with our landlord into his grounds. He had laid out a large garden and vineyard, and was now planting wood, and making other improvements, by which, if he succeeds, his place will become a little paradise, in the midst of a wilderness.

The Great Haue Hoek presents itself here, with many small peaks. Its rocks are the habitations of baboons, which, indeed, occupy the summits of all the neighbouring hills. Mr. Urie entertained us with an account of a combat he had lately beheld, on the waste, adjoining his gardens, between a large herd of baboons from the Haue Hoek, and a party from the opposite range. It was maintained on both sides with great fury, and with noisy yells and barkings, when, suddenly, a stop was put to it, by an unfortunate jackal running in among them. The poor animal was seized by one party and thrown towards the other, then back again. His cries, added to those of the combatants, filled the air with the most discordant sounds, till the death of the intruder seemed to give the signal for a general retreat.

Hearing that the ford of the Palmite Rivier was impassable, we drove to the bridge. At the toll-house we found a miserable night's lodging, rose early on the 14th, and passed over the bridge, which is of wood, and the only bridge in all South Africa. It rests upon stone piers, thought sufficiently strong to resist the force of the stream, which sometimes, in the rainy season, becomes extremely rapid and fierce, but was now nearly hid among palmite-plants and low bushes, growing in its bed. To prevent the wood-work from being washed off the piers in great floods, the timbers are fastened to them by strong chains, on the side of the water's descent. The bridge is furnished with railings, and on the floor-planks, the thick spongy stalks of the palmite-plant are laid in abundance, partly to afford an easier passage for the bullock's feet, and partly to deaden the sound of the wood, by which they are apt to be frightened. Two waggoners had spanned out on the opposite bank, and both they and their dogs seemed much alarmed at our early approach. The moon shone bright, and its reflection upon the eastern ascent of the mountain, which is covered with decomposed quartz, frittered into white sand, gave it the appearance of a field covered with snow. In one place, the road is steep, and full of rocky ledges.

The eastern approach to the top of Hottentot-Hollands-Kloof is guarded on each side by fragments of rocks, thrown into a variety of fanciful groupings, and odd shapes. The road down the western declivity, though irremediably steep, has been much improved by the English. The adjoining precipices are rugged in the extreme, but every practicable spot is covered with a profusion of curious plants and shrubs. The sugar-bush grows here in great plenty, and, with its magnificent starry flower, adorns the wild region. At the top of the western descent, I noticed a vein of iron-stone, with sand-stone and indurated clay, of a reddish or violet colour, which forms the mass of that part of the hill, called the Rothe Hoekte. Towards the bottom, all the fragments of rock (for there are no large masses visible,) are of a coarse grit or granite.

About nine, we reached Mr. Brenk's inn, where we were obliged to remain four hours, to let our poor famished oxen enjoy some food and rest. At two, we proceeded, called at Mr. Morgel's farm, and reached Mr. Delport's house at the Moddergat. Darkness and fatigue made us glad to find here a comfortable night's lodging. We were all put into one room, where we had also the honour of having our host and a boy in the same dormitory with us. The good man went to bed with a pipe in his mouth. When he felt sleep coming on, he placed it in a chair, to be ready in the morning. Between two and three o'clock, he struck a light, without quitting his bed, and fell to smoking again. It proved, however, no annoyance, for their being no ceiling to the apartment, the volumes of smoke, which rose curling from his lips, had room to spread to the top of the roof.

15th. Our oxen having strayed far away, in search of food, we were detained some hours after dawn of day. I improved the time, to make an accurate drawing of a remarkable mountain, called the Helderberg or Simonsberg, belonging to the Stellenbosch range, the rocky summit of which exhibits a most singular variety of peaks and copulas. The village of Stellenbosch presents itself beautifully, with its groves, avenues, and plantations of fir and other trees. While the waggon followed slowly, I walked through some of its streets. We were hospitably received and entertained at Mr. Dirk Cloete's farm, and in the afternoon, continued our route to Mr. Neukirch's house, where we met with a reception equally kind, and spent an agreeable evening. The house is new, and when completed, and the grounds improved by plantations and gardens, the situation promises to be one of the most pleasant in the whole country. Over the principal door, in a medallion, are the words, "memento mori."

Our driver, Marcus, and the leader, had meanwhile driven the oxen to a feeding-place at some distance. The poor beasts were so much fatigued, that we hardly expected them to bring us to-day to Groenekloof. We proceeded through an uninteresting country, to an outspann-place, near Diep Revier, where Sister Leitner provided us both with breakfast and dinner. Between these two meals, I walked about the waste, and found some situations, from which the Stellenbosch hills are seen to advantage, as likewise the Table-Mountain, and the lower ranges of the Tygerberg, Koeberg, and Paerdeberg. I found some odd varieties of iron-stone, and sitting down among the bushes, made an index to the many sketches and drawings, which Mr. Melville and I had made, during our journey.

Thus employed, I seldom found time to hang heavy upon my hands, during the many tiresome delays by outspanning and other circumstances, connected with an African journey; and may I never be wanting in gratitude to God, for granting to me such health, liveliness and activity of mind, during this whole period, insomuch that I never felt disposed to take an African nap after dinner.

Our evening-worship consisted in singing several verses in the waggon, which I should not notice, were it not to record the behaviour of the Hottentots, who, though before obliged, by continual shouting and cracking of whips, to keep our wearied cattle from stopping, or even lying down, walked quietly and devoutly near the waggon, and left the poor beasts to take their time.

We reached the miller Bruckman's house at eight o'clock, and found good quarters. A loquacious countryman, who had come in to spend the night, treated us with his opinions on the state of the Hottentots and Caffres, whom he considered as the Canaanites of this land, destined to be destroyed by the white people, who were the Israelites of God! It is strange, that the same notions haunted the brains of many wicked fanatics in North America, about seventy years ago, who, on that account, opposed the Missions of our Church among the Indians, as may be seen in Loskiel's history.

17th. We did not reach Groenckloof till eleven o'clock. The day was spent in visiting some of the families, and making various arrangements.

18th. We were visited by Mr. Slabbert, the proprietor of the Langefonteyn farm. Vaillant has made honourable mention of this family, and I was glad to become acquainted with a man, who in many respects, is superior to most so-called Africaner, in intellect and liberality of sentiment. Speaking of Vaillant, he was rather surprised to hear, that his own account states him to have been a man of an undaunted spirit, whereas he passed with the Slabberts, for a very timid and faint-hearted traveller.

19th. We conferred together about the site of the new church, and made a calculation of the wood required for that, and the repairs of one of the out-houses, which had been burnt some years before the missionaries were put in possession of the premises by the Earl of Caledon. Sister Schmitt had, at her own expense, fitted up one end of it for a school-room, but now the increase of the establishment rendered more dwellings necessary. I likewise resolved to accompany my Gnadenthal friends to Capetown, with a view to transact some business relating to this settlement, with His Excellency, the Governor.

20th. We set out after dinner, and arrived, about seven, at Blaumberg, Mr. Kotzee's house, where we spent the night. We soon perceived, that our visit was not very agreeable, for Mr. Kotzee's mother-in-law being so ill, that her death was shortly expected, and his wife likewise unwell, it was no wonder, that such intrusion was not well-timed. Not every man has the gift of immediately smothering unpleasant feelings, when strangers interrupt the usual course of the family, by coming unannounced, and demanding quarters for the night. Nor can the inmate know, whether these intruders may not, as is sometimes the case, fill the house with noise and restlessness. Had the slave, whom we first accosted, informed us of the state of the family, we should have quietly remained in our waggon, notwithstanding the general invitation formerly given by Mr. Kotzee to the missionaries at Groenekloof, when he visited that place. However, after the first expressions of displeasure had passed by, he behaved towards us with the greatest civility, and hospitality. His house is one of the best in the country, and elegant in its arrangements and furniture. Every thing in it is conducted with great order.

21st. After breakfasting with the family, we left Blaumberg at eight o'clock. This being the shortest day, we were glad, that the weather turned out fine, and had as pleasant a ride to Capetown, as the dreary country and sandy road would allow. The tediousness of the journey around the bay is considerably relieved by the magnificent view of the Table-Mountain and its associates, on a fine day.

We arrived at Mrs. Disandt's house about two o'clock, and soon had the pleasure to see our worthy friends Mr. Hancke and Mr. Melville. I also found here Mr. Edward Grant, from Bombay, with whom I contracted a very agreeable acquaintance.

22d. This day was spent in visiting friends, old and new. I likewise increased my collection of horns, by the purchase of those of a koodoo, gnou, hartebeest, and gemsbock.

23d. We attended divine service in the Lutheran church. The hymns are sung in German, but the sermon delivered in Dutch. I did not understand much of the Rev. Mr. Hesse's discourse, though, by this time, I am tolerably well acquainted with Gnadenthal Dutch. This is a very convenient variety of that ancient language, and much to be recommended; for as our missionaries have learnt Dutch, chiefly by books, and from each other, their dialect is so well mixed with German, both as to words and pronunciation, that it is easily understood, both by a person acquainted with the German language only, and by a native Dutchman, ignorant of German; and surely no one will deny, that a language so constructed, that of two different nations, each may understand it, is a most desirable medium of conveying ideas, which is the proper use of speech.

24th. At nine in the morning, Brother Leitner and his wife accompanied me, by invitation, to the villa of our friend, Mr. Hoetz, who sent his carriage for us. The morning was delightful. The villa is situated about three English miles from Capetown, on the road to Newlands, at the back of the Table-Mountain. From the gardens, the view of the house, with so magnificent a background, is charming. Its elegant portico is half hid by the branches of large trees, with which the premises abound. Many singular varieties of the aloe and Indian fig are found in the gardens. The plantations of oak and firs, between the house and the mountain, are extensive, and kept in good order by Mr. Hoetz, who took the trouble to walk with us through the greatest part of his grounds. About a fortnight ago, a male tyger was shot near the back-wall, the skin of which was remarkably beautiful.

Considering the quantity of cover, both of rock and wood, which tygers and other ravenous beasts might find in this wild region, it is surprising, that not more of them are seen and taken. We returned to town about twelve, when I went to the Colonial Office, and called upon the Governor, Colonel Bird, and Mr. Melville.

25th. To-day my travelling companions from Gnadenthal prepared for their return, and after waiting long for their waggon, owing to the usual tardiness of Hottentot drivers, they set out at three in the afternoon. A slave, emancipated by the will of his master, on condition of his living at Gnadenthal, and receiving Christian instruction, went with them. Mr. Melville and I walked with them as far as the turnpike. There I took a last leave of my Gnadenthal friends, who still vainly hoped, that I should visit them once more, no opportunity offering for my speedy departure for England. But travelling at this time of the year is connected with so much delay, inconvenience, and uncertainty, that, far from indulging the idea of returning to Gnadenthal, I am almost of opinion, that I have been too much attached to that place, and staid in it too long. Our best wishes and prayers attend each other in our several employments and travels. I parted with some regret from Marcus, who had so long been my faithful coachman, and always approved himself worthy of his Christian name and profession. Brother Schmitt and his wife arrived to-day from Groenekloof.

26th. I went in Mr. Hancke's sociable, with Mr. Edward Grant, to Newlands, to pay a morning-visit to the Governor, but was unsuccessful. In the evening, his Excellency sent me an invitation to attend him on the following day.

27th. This morning, I had the pleasure to receive letters from England, by which I was informed of the safe arrival of all my letters written at sea. The Spaniard and Dane had been the most tardy in forwarding them.

In the afternoon, I set out for Newlands, with Mr. Edward Grant for my companion. I found there Mr. Von Rhyneveld, the landdrost of Stellenbosch, his lady, and Colonel Monkton. My visit proved very pleasant and useful, as both during the course of the evening, and in the morning of the 28th. I was favoured with much conversation with his Excellency, concerning affairs of consequence to the Mission, when I again had many proofs of his favourable disposition towards it. Having an engagement at Capetown in the evening, I returned on horseback, though it rained hard.

29th. My Groenekloof friends introduced me to Mr. Sebastian Van Rhenen, where we dined. This gentleman has been a friend to the Groenekloof Mission from its beginning. Having formerly travelled all over the colony, he gave us some interesting information on several topics, but particularly on the state of agriculture, in the colony. His remarks, founded on long experience, respecting the regulations now adopted to improve the rearing of produce, and the breed of cattle and sheep, the introduction of better implements of husbandry, the frequent change of Governors, and the new taxation, appeared just and well supported.

30th. We attended divine worship at the Lutheran church, where, as the Rev. Mr. Hesse informed me, some extraordinary music was to be performed, to solemnize the commemoration of the delivery of the Augsburg Confession. I expected some ecclesiastical anthem in the good old Lutheran style, but was sadly disappointed. By way of a prelude, the organist, a very clever performer both on the piano-forte and violin, assisted by about six or eight of the military band, treated us with the middle movement of Haydn's military symphony. The performance of this martial piece was surely a very improper preparation for religious worship. On Mr. Hesse's entering the church, and stepping before the altar, he pronounced the words; "Holy is God! Holy is God! the Lord of Sabaoth!" Between each sentence, a choir, consisting of four or five men, sung the same words to music, pretending to be the Sanctus in Haydn's first mass, but strangely altered and mangled. The singers had no copies written out for their use, but, turning their backs to the congregation, looked over the organist's shoulder's into his book. The majestic simplicity of the Lutheran hymn-tunes was lost, in a display of the most flourishing decorations. Still I hoped, that, during some part of the service, which, as far as the preacher and congregation were concerned, was conducted with great solemnity, some anthem would be performed. I was mistaken; for, as a prelude to one of the four hymns appointed for the occasion, we were treated with another instrumental piece of Haydn, beautiful in its composition, and well executed by the band, but rather suited to accompany a dance, than to excite devotional feelings. Of Mr. Hesse's most impressive discourse, I understood more, than on a former occasion, having seated myself near the pulpit. He closed it with a serious, and indeed mournful, consideration of the great degeneracy, now prevailing throughout the Protestant communion, and with an earnest, but affectionate address to his congregation, and especially to the youth, exhorting them to consider their ways, and return unto the Lord, who had granted them such great privileges, and the free use of His Holy Word and Sacraments. But, as if to efface all due impression made upon the audience, by the solemnity of Mr. Hesse's discourse, the organist struck up the last movement of the military symphony, which half the congregation staid to hear.

I must confess, that I left the church with pain and disgust. Though blame may attach to the persons engaged in this degradation of the service, and of that noble art, which is so suitably and acceptably employed to promote devotion, when under the influence of a proper spirit, yet the cause of grief and regret in the heart of every sincere Christian, on account of such incongruities, lies deeper. That such things exist, is one convincing proof, among many, of the truth of the reverend preacher's description of the present degeneracy. In those days, when the Protestant Confession was presented at Augsburg, would such performances have been borne in a place of worship?

Luther knew the value of music, and the strong influence it has upon the mind and affections, and therefore wisely retained the use of it in the Church. He increased the number of hymns, and by these means caused the knowledge of evangelical truth to spread fast among the people. Nor did he object to those antiphonal and choral performances, which accompanied both the Jewish and the primitive Christian worship, and furnish an agreeable variety and relief. But it was never the design of this great reformer, that the church should be the theatre, upon which music-masters and singers might exhibit the swiftness of their fingers, or the powers of their voice. There are other opportunities and places, where this may be done with propriety, and give delight to the most religious scientific admirer of the art. But in the house of prayer, these exhibitions are out of place, and the skill and taste of the performer should rather be discovered, by his knowing how to give majesty and effect to simplicity, without drawing the attention of the congregation from the worship of God, to the admiration of himself. Instrumental music speaks a language, and expresses affections, as well as vocal. This is understood but imperfectly; yet there are few, who will not grant, that a march or a jig, performed by instruments, though it may afford pleasure in the field, or in a concert-room, speaks a language, as little calculated to promote devotion, as an entertaining story, or a sally of wit.

We dined with Mr. Poleman, whose friendship I learnt to value more and more, the better I became acquainted with him. Our evening was very agreeably spent with the Rev. Mr. Hesse.

July 1st. Having taken leave of our worthy friend, Mrs. Disandt, at whose house we had been most hospitably entertained, we assembled at Mr. Melville's, and about ten o'clock left Capetown for Groenekloof. In the evening, we reached Mr. Kaus's farm, called Lange Rück, where we found good quarters for the night.

2d. We arrived safe at Groenekloof. I was pleased to observe the growth of Indian figs, planted as a fence to the burial-ground. Some new attempts to raise plantations of young trees had been made, but did not seem to succeed.

3d. A trap having been set in a ravine, to catch mausehund, a muskiliat-cat was found in it, which Brother Stein brought home. It was extremely fierce, and had nearly escaped, when brought out of the trap. The skin was beautifully variegated with stripes and spots. The ground-colour a blueish grey, the spots black, with some admixture of brown. It is a species of viverra, with a long snout, and very sharp fangs. That, now caught, measured a foot and a half from its snout to the root of the tail; the latter was of the same length as the body, with black and grey rings from the root to the tip. The smell of musk was very powerful in its skin, even after hanging five or six weeks in the open air.

4th. The trap being again set, a mausehund was caught, and preserved alive. It was a pretty creature, fierce and restless, uttering a sharp, barking noise, but being yet young, easily tamed, and, after some time, brought to take its meat out of any man's hand. After having for some weeks patiently borne its confinement in a small kennel, it had the good fortune one night to gnaw off the thong, by which it was fastened, and thus to regain its liberty.

6th. The Lord's Supper was administered. Though this congregation is smaller, and consequently the communicants fewer in number than at Gnadenthal, yet, having first at Groenekloof seen a congregation of Christian Hottentots, and received the first strong impressions in my mind of the inestimable value of that work of God, by which the conversion of these poor people is effected, I perceived, that no subsequent circumstances had effaced them. I enjoyed an aftertaste of that peculiar delight which I then experienced, in seeing this congregation, met on so solemn an occasion. The external appearance of the communicants is here remarkably neat and clean. Both men and women were dressed in white cottons, and their deportment was very devout and respectful. He, who has promised, that, where two or three are gathered together in His name, He will be in the midst of them, blessed us with an encouraging perception of His divine presence.

CHAPTER XIX.

Return to England deferred. Consultations about the new Church. Visit to the Groote Post. Mr. Croucher. Visit Cruywagens Kraal and Lauweskloof. Particular account of Brother Schmitt's encounter with a tyger. Of the first sermon in the Poplar wood. Earth-hogs undermining Captain Klampus's dwelling. Cape lark. Journey to the Cape. Puffaders. Cape Butchers. Engage a passage in the Brilliant. Account of a whale. Mr. Zorn. Mr. Buck. Antelopes. Mr. Hesse. Ride to Green Point. Granite and Schistus. Return to Groenekloof. Rockyeminences. Hartebeest Kopf. Cornland. Hottentot manner of sowing corn. Father Schwinn's decease. Violent storm.

ON the 7th, I received a letter from Mr. Hancke, informing me, that in consequence of my having desired a passage to England to be secured for me, on board the first homeward-bound ship, he had provisionally done it in the Francis and Eliza, which would sail in a few days; yet subject to my own decision. The notice being so short, I was brought into some dilemma, but resolved to go to Capetown, and make further inquiry. In the night, I was seized with headach, and felt too unwell, to think of setting off in the morning.

8th. My indisposition confined me to the room, both this and the following day. The weather likewise became unfavourable, and the rainy season seemed to set in with violence.

10th. Instead, therefore, of going, I sent a messenger to the Cape, and declined the offer of a passage on board the above-mentioned vessel. Nor had I finished all I had yet to do at Groenekloof. I had afterwards reason to believe, that it was providential, that I was detained.

11th. In the afternoon, Mr. Melville arrived here, being engaged to make a general survey of the Groenekloof district, and as we were now daily considering of the best manner of procuring men and means to build the new church, we were glad to have so able a counsellor to assist in our deliberations.

12th. I drew up a writing, to be placed in the foundation-stone, which, in the sequel, was approved and signed by all the missionaries. After Mr. Melville had left us, Brother Schmitt rode with me to the Groote Post, to engage Mr. Croucher, the overseer, to come to Groenekloof on a survey of the wood, that we might know, what trees might be useful for spars and scaffolding.

The Groote Post, which is a Government farm, and hunting-seat of the Governor, lies nearly north of Groenekloof. On ascending the heights, it appears, at about an hour's distance, pleasantly situated, under a range of low heathy hills. The road passes through a wilderness, covered with rhinoceros and other bushes, harbouring various kinds of game. We started some rehbock antelopes, and several black cocks or Korhans, which betray themselves by a loud chattering noise, in endeavouring to escape: On the hills lie many huge fragments of stones, loosely thrown together, affording shelter to baboons, wolves, and jackals. But these animals are seldom seen, without going into their haunts. They prove their presence in the country, by their frequent depredations and other misdeeds. At night, the two latter sally forth on predatory expeditions; the baboon retires into his strong-hold at sunset.

The Conterberg is the highest mountain in this part of the country; then follows the Lauwes kloof hill. The lower ranges take a direction from south-west to north-east.

Much ground has been cultivated at the Groote Post, and its fields and gardens look like a green carpet, spread on the brown waste. The house is not large, and, though said to be built under English direction, is wholly Dutch in its arrangements. A clumsy flight of steps leads to the main entrance. The kitchen and servants' hall are close to the sitting room, which has a huge fire-place, quite out of proportion with the size of the room. One of the wings is divided into cells for visitors, each containing a neat camp-bed, table, and chair. The building is not worthy to be the country-residence of the Governor of this colony, and his Excellency resides chiefly at Newlands.

We were welcomed with much civility by the overseer, Mr. Croucher. He showed us a flock of about two hundred lambs, between the Spanish and Cape breed.

The stone, used for building, and brought off the adjoining hills and waste, is a variety of grit or granite, its component parts being remarkably small! Having agreed to meet Mr. Croucher on the day following, we returned, and in passing, saw the Corn-land belonging to our Hottentots, situated on an eminence, called the Hartebeest Kopf, where many of them were diligently employed, under the inspection of Brother Fritsch.

12th. We walked through the wood with Mr. Croucher. He very obligingly yielded to all our wishes, and desired, that the trees we thought useful for our buildings might be marked. He also pointed out a mode of constructing Hottentot houses in a more expeditious, convenient, and durable manner, than is done at present; and offered to come with a slave, and help to build the next house to be added to the village; and otherwise to render any service to the mission. I mention this with the more satisfaction, as an opinion had been entertained at Groenekloof, that he was not friendly to the Mission, which some former transactions, in which, however, he was not personally to blame, seemed to justify. How often do we perceive, that opinions formed from appearances are fallacious! Nothing, surely, would more promote the peace of society and goodwill among men, than frequent and unreserved explanations. Mr. Croucher came from the neighbourhood of Guildford in Surry, and is well skilled in the art of rearing and preserving trees.

After dinner, Brother Schmitt rode with me to Cruywagens Kraal and Lauwes kloof, both belonging to Groenekloof. By the way, we visited a plantation on the waste, begun some time ago by Brother Bonatz, which the heat and dryness of the sand will not permit to thrive. Cruywagens Kraal is an old Hottentot station, in a pleasant, fruitful valley, with a supply of water from a fountain, but now only used for pasture. A considerable number of oxen were feeding upon it. As we ascended the hill, an extensive view of the Zwartland presented itself, appearing like a heathy and desolate plain, with a few scattered farms. The mountains of Tulbach and Rodesand, lay in the back ground, the highest of which was covered with snow. After crossing the head of the valley, we turned towards that part of the Lauwesklloof hill, where Brother Schmitt, in the year 1811, had an encounter with a tyger. I had been very desirous to visit that spot in his company, where he might describe to me all the particulars of that terrible conflict. Though a pretty full account of it is inserted in the Periodical Accounts of the Missions of the Brethren, vol. v. p. 118, in an extract of a letter from his wife to me, yet I believe I shall not be thought to trespass on the patience of my readers, if I repeat it here, as related to me by himself, standing on the scene of action.

Wolves having done much mischief at Groenekloof, where they even entered the yard and took away a sheep, and in the fields worried several beasts belonging to the Hottentots, an attempt was made, on the 6th of August, to find out their haunts, and, if possible, to destroy them. For that purpose, the missionaries Bonatz and Schmitt, with about thirty Hottentots, set out early in the morning, towards the Lauwesklloof hill, where they are mostly met with. One of these animals was seen and lamed by a shot, but escaped and entered the bushes. The Hottentots followed, but the missionaries, not expecting to succeed, were returning, when the party called to them, that the wounded wolf was in the thicket. Brother Schmitt rode back, and alighting, entered with a Hottentot of the name of Philip Moses. The dog started some animal, which those within the bushes could not see; but the Hottentots remaining on the outside, perceiving it to be a tyger, called aloud to the missionary to return. He therefore, with Philip, began to retreat backwards, pointing his gun, and ready to fire, in case the animal made his appearance. Suddenly a tyger sprang forward, but from a quarter not expected, and by a flying leap over the bushes, fastened upon the Hottentot, seizing his nose and face with claws and teeth. I measured the distance of the place, from whence the tyger made his spring, to that on which the Hottentot stood, and found it full twenty feet, over bushes from six to eight feet high. Brother Schmitt observed, that if it had not been for the horror of the scene, it would have been a most amusing sight, to behold the enraged creature fly, like a bird, over that length of ground and bushes, with open jaw and lashing tail, screaming with the greatest violence. Poor Philip was thrown down, and in the conflict lay now upon, and then under, the tyger. The missionary might easily have effected his escape, but his own safety never entered his thoughts. Duty and pity made him instantly run forward to the assistance of the sufferer. He pointed his gun, but the motions of both the Hottentot and the tyger, in rolling about and struggling, were so swift, that he durst not venture to pull the trigger, lest he should injure Philip. The tyger, perceiving him take aim, instantly quitted his hold, worked himself from under the Hottentot, and flew like lightning upon Brother Schmitt. As the gun was of no use in such close quarters, he let it fall, and presented his left arm, to shield his face. The tyger instantly seized it with his jaw, Brother Schmitt with the same arm catching one of his paws, to prevent his outstretched claws from reaching his body. With the other paw, however, the tyger continued striking towards his breast, and tearing his clothes. Both fell in the scuffle, and providentially, in such a position, that the missionary's knee, without design, came to rest on the pit of the tyger's stomach. At the same time, he grasped the animal's throat with his right hand, keeping him down with all his might. The seizure of his throat, made the tyger instantly let go his hold, but not before Brother Schmitt had received another bite, nearer the elbow. His face lay right over that of the tyger's, whose open mouth, from the pressure of his wind-pipe, sent forth the most hideous, hoarse, and convulsive groans, while his starting eyes, like live coals, seemed to flash with fire.

In this situation, Brother Schmitt called aloud to the Hottentots, to come to his rescue, for his strength was fast failing, rage and agony supplying to the animal extraordinary force, in his attempts to disengage himself. The Hottentots at length ventured to enter the thicket, and one of them, snatching the loaded gun, which lay on the ground, presented it and shot the tyger, under the missionary's hand, right through the heart. His death was instantaneous, his eyes shut, his jaw fell, and he lay motionless. Had any life been left, his dying struggles might yet have proved fatal to some of his assailants.

Then first Brother Schmitt began to feel the extent of the injury done to his arm, but his chief concern was to know, how poor Philip had fared. He found, that he had exerted himself to rise and help his teacher; but his face being terribly lacerated, and his eyes filled with blood, he could not render any assistance. Horses being provided, they were both brought home.

Sister Schmitt instantly dispatched a messenger to Capetown, to request the attendance of Dr. Cairns, of the Naval Hospital. The doctor was so much engaged, that he could not come, till after three days had elapsed. Meanwhile, the Brethren had done all in their power to afford relief, but without success. The fever and inflammation increased daily. The patient grew delirious, and told me, that in his delirium, nothing appeared so dreadful to him, as the picture of the tyger's open jaws and fiery eyes, presented to his disordered imagination. He thought himself still in that position. On the arrival of Dr. Cairns, every possible means were used to bring down the inflammation. There were seven deep wounds in the arm. In two or three places, the tyger's fangs had penetrated into the bone. For several weeks, the life of this valuable man was in the greatest danger, but by God's blessing on the unwearied exertions of Dr. Cairns, and the excellent nursing of his faithful wife, he recovered.

Standing in the thicket, while I was listening to my friend's account of his adventure, the sun was fast sinking towards the horizon ; lengthened shades and evening gloom overspread the place ; imagination began its work : we thought we heard something stirring among the bushes, and retreating faster than we had entered, mounted our horses, and made the best of our way down a rough road, towards the few Hottentot houses in the vale.

About a month after the event here related had taken place, a Groenekloof Hottentot, passing through the same thicket, saw a large male tyger crouching beneath a bush, and hoped to be able to shoot it, but his gun missed fire. The tyger, however, lay still, keeping his eyes fixed upon the man, who was glad to retreat backwards and make his escape.

Having reached the little poplar wood in the vale, Brother Schmitt showed me the place where Brother Kohrhammer, on visiting this spot in 1807, by desire of the Earl of Caledon, delivered the first sermon to about an hundred heathen Hottentots, then inhabiting the Lauwesklouf. He stood under a tree, and his congregation near a pool of water in the wood.

Here we were accosted by an old woman, the most ugly and deformed Hottentot female I had ever beheld. She told us, that a slave, by a charm, had destroyed her beauty, and caused her face to exhibit such bulbous excrescencies. Brother Schmitt, who knew her, replied, that she ought not to endeavour to set her conscience to rest with that idle and wicked tale, but rather repent of her profligate life, by which, she had brought misery and ugliness upon herself. She called God to witness, that the stories told and believed, respecting her wicked life, were totally false, and used such language, that one might have supposed her to have been under Christian instruction, whereas she is a sworn enemy of the gospel, and never would even enter the chapel at Groenekloof.

We next called upon old Captain Klapmus, who inhabits a miserable bondhoek, though he affects to behave with all the pride of a man of consequence. To see this poor blind man, groping his way out of his dark abode to bid us welcome, was a truly pitiable sight. Still more blind as to those things, which are of most importance to the soul, he now paid no attention to Brother Schmitt's friendly invitation to come to Groenekloof. The missionary reminded him of his daughter's baptism, and the hopes then entertained by us all, that he would follow her example, and in his old age, turn to the Lord. He excused himself with a lameness in his back, but all good impression, made upon him at that time, seemed to have vanished. Yet he expressed himself pleased and thankful for our visit.

Earth-hogs had made approaches towards his hut, which they seemed disposed to undermine. Several of their holes were not far off, and being aware of the danger, he made some inquiry about them. We advised him, either to get his people to destroy them, or to remove his hut, as otherwise, before he was aware, he and the old woman that attended him, might be suddenly let down alive into their sepulchral caverns.

These singular creatures are about as large as a common pig. They have a long snout, long sharp claws, very little hair, and a rough skin. Their food is the ants, and probably other insects. The ants carry their nests under ground, sometimes to a depth of from five to eight and more feet. The earth-hogs therefore follow them, and, putting in their long tongue, draw them out and devour them. The holes made by these creatures, are often hid among the bushes, and a huntsman crossing the waste, may meet with an unexpected overthrow, either by falling into them, or by the earth being undermined near the entrance, giving way under the horse's feet.

During this ride, I was likewise made attentive to a bird, improperly called a lark. It is about the size of a lark, flies up with a rustling noise, rises to a moderate height, and lying on its wings, descends, uttering a mournful whoop or whistle. Its melancholy note produces the reverse of the cheering effect of the spirited song of our European larks.

The sugar-bush grows plentifully in the wilderness, and in increasing quantity. It has a magnificent flower, and the wood and roots are good fuel.

16th. Letters from Capetown, mentioning a brig, the Brilliant, Captain Young, as likely soon to sail for England, I set out for the Cape, with a sensible Hottentot for my groom, about eight o'clock. I contrived to converse with him during the journey in Dutch, and found considerable entertainment in the remarks he made on various subjects.

Many tortoises crawl about the waste. They are not large, generally from six to eight inches long. A small species called Pat-looper, is from four to five inches. In warm weather, inclining to rain, they are often seen crawling from one bush to another across the road. Observing to my Hottentot, that they were the best protected of all the innoxious animals of this howling wilderness, he was of a different opinion. The jackals, he replied, watch for the young tortoises, crack their tender shell as easily as a nut, and devour them: again, the crows attack the larger ones, as they are passing over a place, unprotected by bushes, turn them over, and by inserting their long bills into the open parts of the shell, sieze their feet and heads, and most dexterously contrive, by degrees, to pick out the whole animal. Of that most venomous reptile, the puffader, he gave me several strange accounts, hardly to be credited. It is said, that the production of the young brood is the death of the dam, as they begin their murderous career, by gnawing their way out of her body. I should not mention this circumstance, if I had not heard it asserted by men of credit.

We baited at a farm, belonging to a Mr. Munnick, who was absent. I walked about the premises, and found some curious varieties of ferruginous sand-stone, in scattered fragments. Near the Riet valley, we met a Groenekloof Hottentot, Immanuel, returning with his waggon from Capetown. He very civilly alighted, and came up to me, but forgot to deliver a parcel of letters he had for me. I gladly pardoned his forgetfulness, which was altogether the consequence of extreme modesty. He is one of the most obliging, sensible, well-behaved men, I have ever met with in any country. Often have I admired the manner, in which he performed every part of his office, as a chapel-servant; and in his family and intercourse with mankind, he is a pattern of good conduct.

As we were about to ford the Soute Revier, which was rather swollen, we were overtaken by a butcher in his cart or curricule, driving six horses in hand. As he had seen me at Groenckloof, he hailed and offered me a seat, to bring me dry through the river, of which I accepted. The Cape butchers are considered to be some of the richest men in the country. They fetch their cattle from the interior, pay little for them, run the risk of getting them safe to town, and sell the meat at a high price.

With my worthy Cape friends I found a cordial welcome.

17th. A passage to England was offered me on board the Revolutionary frigate, but though I was assured, that the man of war would bring me much sooner home, I felt some misgiving about accepting the offer. The evening was most agreeably spent with the Rev. Mr. Hesce.

18th. This morning I met Captain Young of the Brilliant, by appointment, on the pier. We had long to wait for the boat, and were meanwhile joined by Mr. and Mrs. Shaw, belonging to Mr. Wesley's connexion, and sent out on a Mission to the Namaquas. The Captain invited them to go on board. The Brilliant is a very fine brig, and I soon made up my mind to engage a passage on board her, both for myself and Brother Bonatz's son, having promised the parents to take him with me.

Three boats were towing a whale into the bay, and on our return to shore, we rowed up to it, and took a view of this enormous fish. It was a female, and pronounced to be but young. She lay on her back, and measured about twenty-five feet in length, and ten in breadth across the middle. Having pushed the boat between a fin and the body, we took off a number of white, round, living animals, of the barnacle kind, about an inch in diameter, cleaving to her skin; as likewise a creature armed with fangs and tweezers, said to be a whale-louse. The whales frequent these bays chiefly to spawn, and almost all those caught here are females.

The delay occasioned by this circumstance, prevented my accompanying the Rev. Mr. Hesse and his family to the residence of Mr. Zorn, late landdrost of the Cape district. Mr. Poleman, however, took me out in his gig. I met there Mr. Bresler, formerly landdrost of Graaf Reynet, and Mr. Matthiesen, a member of the Court of Justice. I was glad of an opportunity of expressing the thanks of our Society to Mr. Zorn, for the kindness he always showed to our missionaries, when they first occupied Groenekloof. The afternoon was pleasantly spent, and we all returned to town on foot. The night was warm, and the heavens brilliantly bespangled with stars. But for the absence of the leaves of the oaks, poplars, and other foreign trees, the weather about this time was equal to the finest summer-weather in Europe.

Mr. Hesse walking with me, we entered into much interesting conversation concerning the difference, more of expressions and forms, than of opinions and doctrines, which distinguish the Lutheran and the Brethren's Churches. He thought, however, that there existed some material difference, as to our views of certain religious tenets, and that, at least, the Brethren had expressed their sentiments very unintelligibly. This is granted to have been the case in former times, for which many apologies have passed unnoticed. But as to those peculiar doctrines, which constitute the very essence of Christianity, the divinity and atonement of Christ, salvation by grace alone, justification by faith, and the necessity of a walk conformable to the word of God, we and all true believers of every denomination, have always agreed, however we may otherwise differ in non-essentials. The more the former are valued, and practically known, the farther the latter will recede into the back-ground.

19th, This forenoon, I accompanied the Rev. Mr. Hesse to the free-school, which is conducted on Dr. Bell's plan. We saw the scholars write and cypher.

Mr. Matthiesen had invited the whole of Mr. Zorn's yesterday's party, with others, to dinner at his house in de Heere-Kracht near the parade. With him and Mr. Zorn, I had much conversation, concerning the present state and future prospects of this colony. They differed widely in their opinions, respecting the policy of present measures, but both seemed to be equally desirous of promoting their country's welfare.

20th. This forenoon I visited my pleasant ship's-companion, Mr. Buck. He had been on a hunting expedition to Saldanha bay, and informed me that he and his party, had shot a hundred and six antelopes. This led once more to a subject, frequently discussed on board the Albion, the useless waste of animal life. Very few of these antelopes could become food, either for the huntsmen or their dogs; the rest were left miserably to perish in the wilderness, killed or maimed, merely to gratify the momentary vanity of being a good marksman. But is not this disposition in mankind owing to a diabolical influence? The least that can be said of it, is this, that it belongs to those inordinate desires, which for a time, seem to suppress all proper feeling, even in a heart otherwise benevolent and kind.

To-day I was introduced by Mr. Alexander to Mr. Dashwood the proprietor of a farm, called Gaensekraal, near Groenekloof.

21st. Having promised the Rev. Mr. Hesse that I would play the organ during the morning-service, at the Lutheran church, I went early, but found the great organ quite out of tune, and was obliged to be contented with the choir-organ and swell. An hundred dollars per annum, is paid to a person to keep it in order. I spent the whole day with my reverend friend and his family, and in the evening, took a short ride with them to Sea Point and Green Point, on the coast, west of the Lion's head.

Since the English have been here, the great consumption of grain had encouraged many inhabitants to cultivate the land between the mountains and the sea, though rather unfruitful, the sward of earth upon the rocks being only between one and two feet in thickness. Trees, therefore, will not thrive, but the situation is well studded with small neat houses and villas, and with gardens and hedges of low bushes. Mr. Alexander's premises on Green Point exhibit some very beautiful geraniums, from three to four feet in height. Here we alighted, and walked to the rocks. Limpets, of from four to five inches in diameter, cleave to them, which, when cleaned and polished, have brilliant colours. At Sea Point, the rocks are chiefly granite, in huge masses, or in strata. Blue schistus appears to lie under them, and inserts itself into the fissures and crevices of the granite. Some men of science here insist upon it, that this schistus is the ground-work of all these mountains, and that the Lion's head and other granite mountains are strata lying upon it. I will not attempt to decide the question, from the imperfect observation I had an opportunity of making. The situation we had visited, not having a single spring of fresh water in it, is denominated, De Kleene Zwartland. The inhabitants either collect rain-water, or send for water to the town. The coast is a favourite promenade of the town's-people, and we met several parties on foot, or in carriages.

22d. Having paid short morning-visits to some friends, I took leave of my kind hostess, Mrs. Disandt about ten o'clock, and left Capetown, in company of Mr. Melville, on horseback, intending to reach Groenekloof to-night. We halted at a farmer's house, to the right of the main road, but not finding him at home, would not be troublesome to his family. A dead ox, just skinned, lay near the house-door, a sight not well calculated to create an appetite, nor to give a very elevated idea of the gentility of the inhabitants. We therefore, after a short rest, proceeded, trusting to the strength and patient abstemiousness of our horses, and reached Groenekloof early in the morning.

23d. Brother Fritsch's birth-day was celebrated by the Hottentots and the family, nearly in the same manner as mentioned page 101. In the afternoon, he accompanied me to some eminences, about two or three miles north of the settlement. Upon the first, a curious assemblage of large blocks of granite form a mass of a singular kind; some, of a pyramidal form, stand upright, others lie horizontally. The interstices between them are filled with many kinds of bushes, and a variety of plants, interesting to a botanist. The second is called the Baviansberg, belonging to the Groenekloof estate. Its summit is likewise covered with rocks and masses of granite, among high bushes. I was made particularly attentive to the great quantity of olive-bushes growing upon it, some of which have stems six or eight inches in diameter, and rise to twelve or more feet in height. A variety of the speckboom attracted my notice. The stem and boughs are easily broken, having hardly the consistency of a carrot or parsnip; the leaf is light-green, waxy, oval, and about two inches by one in surface. The whole upper part of the hill or hills, of which the Baviansberg consists, is covered with a wilderness of every kind of bush and shrub, common to this country, forming an almost impenetrable thicket. In endeavouring to penetrate into it, to have a nearer view of some of the rocks, we soon found resistance made to our progress by thorny plants of various kinds, particularly by one, called Wach en beetgen, or "Stop a little," as it catches the stockings, or some other part of dress, and patience is required to extricate oneself from its barbed hold. Some thorns lie low enough to tear away shoe-strings or knee-bands, and others penetrate the skin. We were glad, after much trouble, to get back into the road.

On the Hartebeest Kopf hill, we found several of our people busily at work, sowing corn. Their manner of doing it is singular. They first cast the corn upon the waste, then plough over it; but as they seldom plough as much land as they overcast, the seed, thus exposed, during the night becomes the prey of birds or field-mice, which they patiently suffer. When I represented to them the injury they sustained, they insisted upon it, that it must be so done in this country, and endeavoured to explain the reason, which I must confess myself too dull to have comprehended.

The harrow they use, is a triangular frame, formed of three pieces of wood, furnished with teeth, four or six inches asunder, and doing very little execution. But prejudice defends even this bungling contrivance.

I observed in that part of the waste, over which I walked to-day a great quantity of Vlachdorn, a decoction of which is so useful in the stranguary, as mentioned above, (page 269). But its use is hardly known in these parts, where many an ox dies of that horrid disease.

My conversation with Brother Fritsch, led me better to understand many subjects connected with the peculiar circumstances and situation of this missionary establishment; and I may here observe, that the confidence, with which all the Brethren treated me, both here and at Gnadenthal, contributed more to that knowledge which I obtained of the external and internal state of the Mission, than any official statements. I feel myself truly thankful for their unreserved communications.

The Groenekloof farm comprehends a large lot of ground. The Hottentots enjoy the benefit of it, and keep, altogether, about four hundred head of cattle; but as to paying any, the most reasonable, consideration for their fields, gardens, and other advantages, it never enters into their thoughts. Hitherto, the Mission must bear all expenses, but by degrees, they should be taught to understand the justice and necessity of paying a small rent, to cover expenses, incurred merely for their sakes.

26th. Having received from Capetown the leaden-box, meant to contain the writing to be placed in the foundation-stone, Brother Schmitt went with me to the hill near the ravine, where, having fixed upon a large block of granite, he marked the square hole to be cut into it, to contain the box. The Hottentot mason set about it very dexterously.

At home, I was busily employed both with correspondence, and other affairs relating to the Mission. Towards evening it began to rain hard, and the wind rose considerably. During the night the gale increased.

27th. The new wall of the dwelling-house, now rebuilding, was so much injured, that great part of the new work must be taken down. Mr. Melville returned to us.

In the evening, Carl Stompje, came express from Gnadenthal, by the short road over the Fransche Hoek, in two days and a half, and brought the news of the decease of Father Schwinn, on the 25th, early. Though, when I left Gnadenthal, he seemed to be fast declining, under a complication of disorders, yet we did not so soon expect his final release, and felt deeply affected on reading the letters received from our brethren, containing a circumstantial account of his last illness and departure, and of the great sensation, produced among the Hottentot congregation by this event.

When in 1792, leave was granted by the Dutch Government, to renew the Mission, he, with his two colleagues, Marsveld and Kuehnel, arrived at the Cape in November of the same year. On the 24th of December, they fixed upon the spot, where the first founder of the Mission, the late George Schmidt, had resided in 1737. The deceased visited Germany in 1799, but returned to his station in 1800.

He was a man of a remarkably cheerful and active mind, and possessed great courage and firmness. His public ministry was distinguished by many bold and convincing testimonies of his faith, which he delivered with peculiar energy, speaking from the abundance of his heart, with demonstration of the Spirit, and conviction to the hearts of his hearers. The Christian Hottentots will always revere his memory. He baptized three hundred and thirty-two persons, old and young, many of whom have departed before him in the faith of Christ.

On the afternoon of the day of his departure, the mournful event was announced to the congregation by Brother Clemens, and caused many tears to flow. The Hottentots were afterwards admitted, in order, into the chamber, to see the corpse of their beloved teacher. They reminded each other of many exhortations given them by him, on so many occasions, and mourned, as over the loss of a father.

On the day preceding the funeral, a great number assembled around the corpse, and under the grove before the door, and sung hymns expressive of the happiness of those, who depart this life, trusting in the merits of their Redeemer, and of the blessedness of that communion of saints, which unites all true believers with the spirits of just men made perfect.

The funeral was attended by a crowded congregation, and by many neighbours, who highly respected the character of the deceased. Many more would have joined the company, had the river Sonderend been fordable at the time. Brother P. Leitner delivered the funeral-discourse on Rev. v. 13, 14, and the strictest order and attention was maintained throughout the whole of the service.

28th. The congregation at Groenekloof was likewise much affected, on being informed this morning, at church, of the loss the Mission had sustained by the departure of Father Schwinn. They expressed their sorrow with many tears.

In the afternoon, two persons were baptized. The humble, but fervent manner, in which the solemn questions put to the catechumens are answered by them, again affected me so much, that some exertion of mind was required to permit me to attend to the ceremonial of the transaction.

After they had returned thanks, as is their usual custom, the husband of the baptized woman, being yet unbaptized, but a man of orderly conduct, came to the missionaries, to express his gratitude for the favour granted to his wife, whom he earnestly wished to follow, in obtaining the same privilege. This was rather unusual; for in general, they cannot well bear a partner to precede, in any advance in the church. During the night, the gale increased to a violent storm. It blew down the vine-bower before the dwelling-house, but did no more damage to the new building.

29th. Carl Stompje set out on his return, notwithstanding the unfavourable appearance of the weather, loaded with letters for Gnadenthal. During the day, it rained and hailed much, and towards evening, we were alarmed for the safety of our roofs. A violent squall, with lightning, thunder, and hail, some of the stones being as large as a walnut, passed over us. The hail seemed to be whirled about by the violence of the wind, and tore a part of the reed-thatch from the roof. The cessation of the storm was almost instantaneous. About midnight all was still. Till then, the lightning was remarkably vivid.

31st. The Governor called here in his way to the Groote Post. His Excellency informed us, that during the late violent gale, the Revolutionaire frigate, the Zebra, and some more ships, in Simon's bay, had been driven on shore, as likewise two ships in Table bay. This is an uncommon effect of a storm at the Cape, for, as the land is very high, between Simon's and Table bay, the one is generally considered safe, when the wind sets into the other; but on this occasion, the storm was more like a hurricane, the wind shifting several times to different points.

Quarry. Aloe garden destroyed. Cuytges, salamanders, and serpents found. Foundation of the new church. Zaccheus Deba, a Caffre from Gnadenthal. Journey to Capetown. Reflections on the enjoyment of earthly comforts. Mr. Sieurvogel. Capetown dogs. Rev. Dr. Jones, Senior chaplain. Apologies not attended to. Mr. Slabbert's waggon and ten horses. Yellow finches. Cameleons. Elephant-stones. Moy-Mack's Revier. Farewell-discourse. Laying the foundation-stone of the new church. Mr. Schroeder. Dacha, a poisonous plant.

AUGUST 1st. It had frozen very hard last night, and the ice was in some places nearly an inch thick. The air, however, was perfectly clear, and the sun shone warm. As I was making a sketch of the rocks behind the stables, Sister Schmitt's school-girls came towards me, one carrying a plate, with a piece of ice in it, fast melting in the sun. They asked me, whether the water, flowing from the ice, might be drank with safety, as they thought, that it was poisonous. I gave them some information on the subject, and when I described the quantity and thickness of the ice in the northern regions, and told them of the immense ice-mountains and fields, floating in the ocean, I perceived, by their astonished looks, that, had they not thought one of their teachers incapable of falsehood or exaggeration, they would have suspected me of sporting with their credulity.

These children are from ten to fourteen years old, and instructed, out of pure charity, by Sister Schmitt, in satten-stich, tainbour, and plain work. It is surprising, with what neatness they have learnt to execute it. When Sister Schmitt first arrived at Groenekloof, and saw the wretched state of most of the Hottentot children, it exceedingly distressed her, and having perceived, that most of the Hottentot women are good seainstresses, and teach their girls early the use of the needle, it occurred to her mind, that they might soon learn to work sattin-stich, which she herself perfectly well understood. She therefore tried the experiment with one or two, and succeeding, added more to the number. By these means, she taught the children to earn their own bread, and even to afford relief to their poor parents. Her countrywoman, Sister Leitner, has done the same at Gnadenthal.

Being invited to dine with the Governor at the Groote Post, I met there Captain Cloete, Mr. Bentinck, and Mr. Ward. We were spending the afternoon very pleasantly, when a dispatch announced to his Excellency the death of his brother at Lisbon. Some time after he had left the room, he sent the letter for our perusal. The mournful news was heard by the company with sincere sympathy, and we spent the remainder of the day in silence and reading.

2d. While I was waiting for my horse, to return to Groenekloof, the Governor, coming into the room, desired me to spend the day with him. I had much conversation with his Excellency, concerning various subjects, and thought my time not unprofitably spent. He kindly acceded to some proposals, laid before him, tending to remove unpleasant disagreements between neighbours.

During the forenoon, Mr. Croucher, by his orders, showed me a new plough, made of cast iron, worked with only two horses, or four, if more depth of furrows is required, without holding the shafts. He wished me to recommend it to our missionaries. In the evening, I took a solitary walk to the hills, and went up to some rocks, or large fragments of granite. They form a good foreground to a view of the Groote Post, lying in the plain. The Table-Mountain and its companions adorn the horizon.

3d. I set out early, and was followed by the Governor, who, after breakfast, passed through Groenekloof, on his return to Capetown.

He was in better health and spirits. I had caught a violent cold, and felt unwell. But a packet of letters from England made me forget all indisposition.

5th. In the afternoon, visiting some Hottentot families, I observed an unfinished house, the walls of stone, and well built, and inquired into the reason of its being left in that state, when I found, that it was owing to a want of wood for the doors, roof, and furniture. This led to an explanation respecting the possession of the wood, and prevented the poor people appealing to the landdrost against the overseer, who had very properly prohibited their cutting wood at their pleasure, by which, formerly, a great many trees have been destroyed. Till better instructed, the Hottentots have no thought beyond the present moment, and being too lazy to stoop and apply their axe to the bottom of the stem, they chop it off as high as they can stand to it, besides maiming others by cutting off their branches, or tops, without any attention to the growth of the tree. The general scarcity of wood makes it therefore highly necessary to prevent such mischief, and as they may have what wood they want, to build their huts, if they only apply to the overseer, there is no hardship in their asking for it. They were satisfied, when Brother Schmitt explained the matter to them.

In the evening, the family met to a consultation respecting the commencement of the building of the new church, and the means of providing food and dwelling for any additional hands.

6th. To-day we began to carry stones from the rocks behind the stables, to lay the foundation of the church, and I was much pleased to see the zeal and spirit, with which the Hottentots went to work. There was indeed a good deal of amusement connected with it, which, with them, is a great stimulus to exertion. Many very large stones were dislodged, and dragged to the building, on a strong sledge, by ten oxen. In separating two parts of an immense block, which, by some violence not accounted for, had a crack right through the middle, a nest of ants of the largest size, was laid open. They were from half, to near three quarters of an inch long. Almost every stone seemed to afford protection to larger or smaller ants. They differed from those, which raise solid nests of clay in all parts of the wilderness, in shape like a baker's oven, and used for that purpose in the interior. The Caffres, when first permitted to settle at Gnadenthal, before they could build ovens, according to the custom of their country, availed themselves of these tumuli, and having expelled or destroyed the inhabitants by fire and smoke, scooped them out hollow, leaving a crust of a few inches in thickness, and used them for baking, putting in three loaves at a time. The clay, of which the nests are formed, is so well prepared by these industrious insects, that it is used for the floors of rooms, both by Hottentots and farmers.

7th. The people continued their work at the stones as long as the weather remained fine, and I frequently accompanied Brother Schmitt, when he attended them. No European labourers could work with greater diligence and effect. We had engaged a Dambrá Hottentot, called Ephraim, to work in a quarry at the top of the eminence, where the granite was split into irregular strata, nearly in a perpendicular direction. The quarry yielded good stone for building walls. The large masses above ground, were of a harder texture, than the stones under the surface. Thin layers of schistus cleaved to some part of the latter. Ephraim distinguished himself by his steadiness and persevering diligence. The Dambras differ much in their manners from the Hottentots of this country, they are of a more swarthy complexion, and have features better formed.

When a large stone was dislodged, I generally met with something deserving attention. To-day I saw, for the first time, that singular animal, called by the Hottentots, the mountain-salamander. It is shaped like a lizard, but broader, seven or eight inches long, and scaly. The scales on the tail are pointed, and stand off from the body, but whether generally, or only in fright or anger, I cannot tell. A nest of young cuytges was uncovered. This is a small species of newt or asker; its bite is said to be very venomous, and as it lodges in old thatch, the Hottentots are very cautious in taking down an old roof. Under some of the stones we found caterpillars, black and hairy.

By the operation of grubbing up, and removing these stones, which may have lain there since the deluge, many flowers, much beautiful shrubbery, and a great quantity of aloes, were destroyed. I defended them as long as I could, but was obliged to submit to the necessity of using the stones. The ground was strewn with flowers and bulbs, shattered aloe-leaves and beautiful plants, but I was assured, for my comfort, that, after a short rest, the earth would bring forth abundantly, and the aloes and fahlblar again adorn the spot. By far the greater part of the masses of stone, being beyond the power of man to move, they still present a singular and beautiful group of rocks, and the removal of the smaller fragments, laying the larger masses more open, gave them more picturesque dignity.

9th. Brother Bonatz, after the meeting for instruction, having proposed to the men, that they should begin to dig the foundation of the church, they immediately fell to work, with great alacrity.

The ground opened easily, but some remnants of old walls were discovered, the farm-house belonging to the Dutch Company having occupied this spot, previous to the building of the present dwelling-house. At the west corner, water appeared, not proceeding from a spring, but oozing out of a sandy stratum. Beneath the sand was a layer of a kind of pipe-clay, and to this we were obliged to penetrate, to get a firm foundation. In the afternoon, I visited several families in the village.

10th, After breakfast, I went to the people at work among the rocks. Between two large flat stones, one lying on the other, leaving a small space between them, we discovered the nest of the serpent, called here, cobra di capella. A Hottentot lad, who had fortified himself against the poison of a serpent's bite, was called, and took out three young ones. One of them I put into a bottle of brandy. We had scarcely disposed of them, before a bergadder made his appearance. It was seized by the neck, and sent after the cobra di capella, into the bottle. Under the same stone, a scorpion, and several large spiders were found. In the evening, Ephraim killed and sent me a young Nachtschlange, or night-serpent, beautifully marked with yellow, vermilion, and dark-blue rings.

11th. Many Hottentots attended the public-service. Brother Schmitt delivered an animated discourse on the gospel of the day; and in his prayer commended the building of the new church, and all who take share in it, to the blessing and protection of our Heavenly Father.

12th. Mr. Melville surprised us very agreeably, by his unexpected arrival. I delivered to him the Governor's order, to make a diagram of this place, by which I had the satisfaction to detain him. To-day, a Caffre, Zaccheus Deba, arrived here from Gnadenthal, with letters and journals. The letters from our missionaries described the impression made upon the Hottentots, by the departure of their beloved Father Schwinn, as very great. They still wept tears of remorse, when they called to mind his affectionate zeal and admonitions, and his tender concern for the salvation of their souls, and for their improvement in all things that adorn the Christian character. We hope that the effect of this contrition will be salutary and permanent.

13th. Being a memorial-day in the Church of the United Brethren, it was celebrated with due solemnity. At nine we met in the chapel. I had never seen this place so well filled, nor a more attentive auditory. Every bench was crowded, and the children sat on the ground. Brother Schmitt delivered a suitable discourse, in which he introduced a most luminous, and even to Hottentots, intelligible, account of the event, which gave rise to this festival. (See Crantz's History of the Brethren. Part I. p. 115.)

Mr. and Mrs. Slabbert were present, on their return from the Cape, and expressed great satisfaction and astonishment at the devout behaviour of the congregation. He informed us, that the sailing of the Brilliant was put off till the 7th of September; a delay, which I then much regretted.

In the evening, the Holy Communion was administered, the Missionaries having previously met, to encourage each other to brotherly love, and that union of spirit, without which, the best intentions, plans, and talents, remain unprofitable in the service of God; for only "where brethren dwell together in unity, there the Lord commandeth his blessing."

14th. In the evening, the Caffre, Zaccheus Deba, came into my room, to take the letters I had written to Gnadenthal. One object he had in view, in offering himself to go as messenger to Groenekloof, was to see me once more, and to tell me, that his wife had departed this life, rejoicing in God her Saviour. He added, that before her departure, she had particularly requested to be remembered to me, with that assurance, that she had continued to pray for me, that the Lord would bless me, and grant me a safe passage to England. I felt thankful for the prayers of this worthy woman, whom I had frequently seen, and conversed with, and knew as a very exemplary character. The mild, humble deportment of Zaccheus, was particularly noticed by a gentleman present.

15th. I accompanied Mr. Melville to Capetown. We proceeded gently, engaged in pleasant conversation, and were seven hours on the road. At Mr. Melville's house, we found two gentlemen, just arrived from Van Diemen's Land. They gave an entertaining account of that earthly paradise.

It would be tedious to relate, in order, all the various occupations and visits, by which my time was employed, during my present stay at Capetown. I will, therefore, only observe, that the society of my friends, the Disandt family, Mr. Hancke, Mr. Poleman, and the reverend Mr. Hesse, proved a source of great enjoyment to my mind.

18th. I attended divine-worship, at the Lutheran church. The organist played more soberly than usual, but could not refrain from performing a very brilliant rondo, from one of Haydn's symphonies, when the service was over. I felt the impropriety of introducing it into the church, but could not help admiring the very great dexterity, with which he executed the most difficult passages, and made them tell on the organ. I was displeased with myself, for not being more displeased with him.

With a very highly esteemed friend, I had a conversation on several subjects, which made a deep impression upon me. Being rather of an anxious turn of mind, he expressed surprise at the confidence and cheerfulness of some Christians. He related, that he was educated in the celebrated Paedagogium at Halle in Saxony, where, contrary to the intention of its founders, he and others were taught to entertain scruples concerning the principal doctrines of Christianity, and to explain away those scriptures, which the Neologen, or Socinians and Deists, found to bear against their favourite opinions. But as he could find no comfort and peace in the new doctrines of self-enlightened men, he began well to consider those, which they had rejected, and, by slow degrees, seemed to obtain more faith in them, and to consider them as the basis of all sound religion. He wished, however, to know my views of that real and convincing experience of the efficacy of faith in Jesus, and the atonement made for sin, which a true believer ought to possess. I gave him a plain and faithful account of the manner, in which, "it pleased God to reveal his Son in me," though naturally averse to religion, falsely supposing, that it tended to check all cheerfulness, and the enjoyment of the pleasures of this life, whereas I now knew, that the only way to live happy, and innocently to enjoy that good, which God has left to us in this world, as "a witness for himself," for our use, improvement, and comfort, was to make sure, that He is our Father, Friend, and Deliverer from the curse and punishment of sin, as declared in the Gospel.

My friend observed, that ever since he had become acquainted with me, he had wondered, how a man of so lively a disposition, could belong to a community so recluse and religious, as that of the Church of the Brethren, in which there were so many checks, by particular rules and regulations, against the ways of the world, and its pleasures and amusements. He added, however, that, in general, he had always found those members of our Church, with whom he had become acquainted, lively and cheerful people, and attentive to the innocent means of making their lives and dwellings on earth comfortable. This led to a consideration of the effects of true conversion of heart, when a man is turned from the love of the world and sin to his God and Saviour, and has his "conversation in heaven." To him it is no act of painful self-denial, to avoid the things that lead from God, and no punishment, to be excluded from them. Surely no one has more reason to be happy and contented, than the man who expects, that better things than those, which he now possesses, will shortly be his portion: he uses the world, yet as not abusing or cleaving to it; and enjoys all the gifts of his Creator with a thankful heart. But I felt, that I ought to take his remark as a kind admonition, to beware, lest too much vivacity and attention to objects, which afford pleasure to the mind, and engage the activity of the intellectual part of man, though sinless in themselves, should sometimes lead to forgetfulness of higher and more important spiritual concerns.

With his Excellency the Governor, I had an opportunity of conversing on some arrangements at Groenekloof, by which real service was done to the Mission. From Colonel Bird, I experienced the same kindness.

Brother Schmitt found Mr. Sieurvogel, a timber-merchant, disposed most honourably to abide by a verbal agreement respecting the price of the timber, wanted for the building of the church at Groenekloof, though by the loss of his vessel, the Young Phoenix, in the late storm, timber had risen considerably in price. But a conscientious man needs no legal tie, to bind him to a promise.

For several nights I was much disturbed in my sleep by the continual barking and howling of dogs in the street, about which the inhabitants seem not to trouble themselves. A large number of these animals have no masters, but find food, shelter, and places to litter in, wherever they can. The people go and pick out such puppies as they think will turn out well, and leave the rest. The heavy rain may have been troublesome to these stray-dogs, and the cause of their nightly vociferations.

Before I left Capetown, I visited the Rev. Mr. Thom, employed by the Missionary Society in London, with whom I had much friendly conversation, concerning the state of their, and our Missions. I also waited upon the Senior Chaplain, the Rev. Dr. Jones, who returned to the Cape some time ago. His services to the colony have been highly beneficial, especially as it regards the improvement of schools. To his benevolent exertions, we owe the building of the school-house at Gnadenthal, and the introduction of Dr. Bell's plan of teaching, as far as it is practicable among Hottentot children.

Brother Schmitt engaged a master-builder, Mr. Schroeder, to undertake the building of the new church at Groenekloof, who advised us to make as many bricks as we could.

After a very pleasant visit, having transacted all our business with satisfaction, we took leave of our worthy friend and hospitable hostess, Mrs. Disandt, and returned on the 22d to Groenekloof, with Mr. Slabbert, in his travelling waggon, he driving ten horses in hand. The four nearest to the waggon are guided by a servant with reins, while his master, sitting beside him on the box, governs the other six, by a dexterous use of the long whip.

23d. I was engaged with packing, intending to send all our baggage on board the Brilliant, which, as the Captain informed us, would be ready to sail by the 5th of September. The Hottentots had not forgotten the bottle of serpents, but brought me a young puffadder, and three cameleons. The cameleons were found in the nest of a yellow finch. The poplar-wood at Groenekloof abounds with these nests. They are like bags, suspended from the ends of the smaller branches of trees, to render them secure against serpents and vermin, but the cameleons had contrived to dislodge the poor birds, and sieze upon the nest. The lateness of the season prevented my taking any animals alive. My friends had provided for me several tortoises, cameleons, fresh water turtles, (a small turtle about four inches square), and even a young baboon.

25th. In the afternoon the whole family, accompanied by Mr. Melville, visited the Oliphants' Klippen, (Elephants' stones), near the Klaberfalg, Mr. Duckett's farm. They are detached masses of granite, erect, or in a leaning posture, situated in a valley, as if they had been thrown from an adjoining hill, or rather, left there by the washing away of the ground, when the valley was formed. Every eminence in this neighbourhood also, is crowned with a collection of stones, forming a kind of rock among the bushes. Many beautiful flowers were now beginning to peep out, as the spring was fast advancing.

26th. Mr. Melville's waggon conveyed all my heavy baggage to Capetown. In the afternoon, Brother Bonatz accompanied me on a visit to that part of the settlement, called Moy Mack's Revier, which lies to the right of the Cape road, on entering the farm. A small stream passes through it, crosses the road, and, skirting the little wood, helps to irrigate the grounds in that part of the village under the hill.

The cottages are of the meaner kind: the gardens slope down towards the brook: the soil is a dry sand, and will require much culture, before it is turned into a fruitful mould. Peter, a Dambra Hottentot, has the best garden, and is an active man. The people seemed much pleased with our visit. We then went to the upper row of cottages, to the left of the road, and there saw a woman upwards of an hundred years old. Sister Schmitt, who had joined us, accosted her, but she appeared quite stupid. Her children and grand-children live with her. She had been an inhabitant for six years, but seemed perfectly indifferent about religion. Of late, however, she sometimes asked a person, in whom she had confidence, whether it were still possible for her to be saved.

The people now begin to dig in their grounds, and in a short time they will look well. But for want of hedges, they cannot prevent their neighbours' cattle from entering their grounds, which sometimes produces great uneasiness. Since by the Governor's kindness, the boundary is now defined, and there need be no more contention about the wood, I endeavoured to impress upon the people the necessity of attending to the making of hedges, and that plantations should be promoted as much as possible, yet under proper regulations, that there may be no useless waste, or even destruction of the young trees, by improper treatment. Mr. Croucher, who visited us about this time, gave the best advice, being well versed in the management of woods.

27th. We visited that part of the village, which we could not reach yesterday, for the inhabitants would have been greatly disappointed and grieved, if I had not called at every house and hut. In the evening, a couple were married at the church.

30th. Our friend, Mr. Slabbert, returning from the Cape, brought with him the master-builder, Mr. Schroeder. With the latter, Mr. Melville and I conferred about the plan of the new church. In the valley to the north of the farm, we sought and found brick-earth, and on examination of the premises, Mr. Schroeder declared, to our great satisfaction, that every facility existed here within reach: good clay for bricks, a sufficient quantity of stone, water, and the right sort of sand. He also pronounced the pipe-clay under the sand, to be a good foundation.

I read my farewell-address this evening to a crowded auditory. After I had finished, Brother Bonatz took the chair; and, after making some observations on my visit and voyage, concluded with prayer, commending me and his son Adolph to the protection and blessing of the Lord.

31st. This was the day appointed for laying the foundation-stone of the new church. The ceremony took place at 10 A. M. Early in the morning, a number of Hottentots had conveyed the stone from the hill to the spot. They delighted in the work, and there was no want of hands. The stone was of a triangular shape, its south-side, four feet five inches; east-side, three feet six inches; north-east side, five feet six inches; and one foot four inches in thickness. A square hole had been punched into it, to hold the leaden box, with the writing.

The service was conducted in the following manner: Brother Schmitt opened it with that hymn; Sing hallelujah, honour, praise, &c. and then addressed the congregation in a suitable discourse. The people stood, both about the ditch, and within the space enclosed. He then read the texts of Scripture appointed for the day: “ Rejoice, because your names are written in heaven. Luke x. 10. Many, O Lord my God, are Thy wonderful works, which Thou hast done, and Thy thoughts which are to us-ward: they cannot be reckoned up in order unto Thee: if I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered. Ps. xl. 5.” Brother Fritsch read the Dutch translation of the contents of the parchment, which he held in his hand, and having delivered it to me, I placed it in the leaden box; Brother Stein deposited it in the foundation-stone. Mr. Schroeder followed, put a flat stone over it, and gave a stroke upon it with a mallet. Each of us followed, repeating the stroke, as is usually done on such occasions. A verse being sung, Brother Bonatz, kneeling upon the stone, offered up a prayer. The congregation then sung that hymn, Now let us praise the Lord, &c. and the blessing being pronounced, the assembly dispersed.

It was a solemn and delightful service. The Hottentots seemed fixed to their places in attention and devotion; and several friends, who were present, expressed their admiration both of their behaviour, their joyful songs of praise, and their fervent expressions of gratitude to God for the mercies bestowed upon them. A spirit of joy and gladness prevailed on this occasion, which, by God's blessing, gave a new stimulus to the exertions of all engaged in the building, and contributed not a little to its completion, in a manner which has given general satisfaction.

Mr. Schroeder, having given us some good advice, left us in the afternoon. We met this evening to make arrangements previous to my departure.

There is in this country a plant, called by the Hottentots Dacha, a species of wild hemp, (cicuta). Some of them smoke it like tobacco, or mix it with the latter herb, and are exceedingly fond of it. Its effects upon the human body are dreadful. It not only takes away the senses for a season, even more completely than drunkenness, but, by degrees, undermines the constitution, weakens every faculty of mind and body, and makes cripples of those that continue in the practice. It is necessary, therefore, that most determined resistance should be made against this destructive propensity, and by a rule established in our settlements, the use of dacha is to be entirely abandoned. Whoever is guilty of smoking it, is excluded; but a seducer of others to the abominable practice, expelled. The chief complaint against the Hottentots is, that they are incorrigibly lazy, and unfit for labour. In most instances, the cause of it is the use of this poisonous herb. Who would believe, therefore, that the very men who complain, should encourage the growth of it in their grounds, and sell it to the Hottentots! Yet this I have seen with my own eyes, even where I least suspected it.

September 1st. Being Sunday, the Hottentots came in parties, between the services, to take leave of me, and with many of them I entered into pleasant conversation. There were some good spokesmen among them, who expressed the sentiments of their brethren in very affectionate terms. Two Dambras, Ephraim and Peter, gave me particular satisfaction, by the modest, unaffected manner, in which they declared their gratitude and good-will.

In the afternoon, all the missionaries met, when I had an opportunity of delivering my sentiments to them concerning the Mission in general, and their situation in particular. In the evening, the Lord's Supper was administered to the communicant congregation, at which I assisted. If I were to express my feelings on this occasion, it would be but a repetition of what I have written concerning my last communion at Gnadenthal. The appearance, devotion, and attention of the Hottentot congregation at this place, was anew the subject of my admiration and thanksgiving for such a miracle of God's power and mercy.

CHAPTER XXI.

Departure from Groenekloof. Detained at Veldcornet Verwey. The Governor's offer of a passage in the Zebra sloop of war. Consequent arrangements. Visit to, and description of, Constantia. Its Vineyards, cellars, and beautiful situation. Return to Groenekloof.

SEPTEMBER 2d was the day, when I expected to close my abode at Groenekloof. The visits of the Hottentots continued to the last moment before my departure, Mr. Stoll, the landdrost of the Cape district, arriving here in the forenoon, expressed great satisfaction with the present state and progress of the Mission. He has always approved himself a friend, ready to give advice and assistance.

Jacob Conrad, a Hottentot, of his own accord, offered his span of eight horses, to convey me and my travelling companions to Capetown; and as his waggon was a very inconvenient vehicle, Mr. Melville, who had given us the pleasure of his company for several days, lent us his travelling waggon.

After dinner, the family met in my room, and after a short address by Brother Bonatz, commended me and my young companion Adolph, to the grace and protection of God our Saviour, on our journey and voyage to England. A considerable number of Hottentots had meanwhile assembled before the door, with every one of whom I shook hands, and bid them farewell, not expecting that I should so soon see them again. While we were entering the waggon, they sung a farewell-hymn, and accompanied us for about two miles, to Papkülls-fonteyn, not intimidated by the rain, which kept us shut up in the waggon.

Sister Bonatz having taken an affectionate leave of her son Adolph, returned with the Hottentots, and the Brethren Fritsch and Stein. Her husband, and Brother Schmitt and his wife, accompanied us to the Cape. Mr. Melville rode on, to bespeak a night's lodging for us at the Veldcornet Mr. Verwey's, where we met with a cordial welcome, and good accommodations. It blew and rained hard all night, and in the morning of the 3d. We found it impossible to proceed. We were, however, well housed, in good spirits, and, contrary to expectation, spent the day very pleasantly, as each felt disposed. Mr. Melville made some copies of his valuable sketches for me.

An old man, going from place to place, to teach the children reading, writing, and cyphering, but not good manners, which are not required, was at this time an inmate of the house, and, like most of these itinerant schoolmasters, seemed to lay down the law on all questions of importance. It would be cruel and unwise, to detract from their consequence or authority, by interference or contradiction.

The rain ceasing for an hour in the afternoon, we went to see the little Sout-Revier, (Salt river), which, even in winter, is but a small stream, but now, by the heavy rain, was swollen into a very deep and rapid torrent of considerable breadth. It is chiefly owing to the want of the smaller streams and brooks, which in Europe, descending from the hills, intersect the plains in all directions, that South Africa remains, and I fear, must in a great degree remain, a wilderness. After all the observations I have been able to make and to collect, during my journey through great part of the colony, I must ascribe this deficiency to the character of the South African mountains. Almost all their summits consist of precipitous rocks. Very little earth, consequently very few morasses are found upon them, and the rain, which is abundant in the rainy season, instead of falling on a spongy soil, retaining the water for a considerable time, and gradually dealing it out in rivulets and brooks, dashes with violence, from the rocks, down the steep declivities, and in destructive torrents sweeps along the kloofs and vallies, frequently and suddenly destroying the labours of many years in places, where, in summer, a small streamlet scarcely furnishes water sufficient for the use of a family. The bushes, covering a great part of the waste, preserve, by their shade, some moisture on the ground, and are providentially furnished with roots of disproportionate thickness, which, imbibing the water, give them sustenance, and maintain their verdure in the dry season. It is also said, that in many beds of torrents, by digging, water may be found, though the heat of the sun has banished all appearance of it from the surface.

4th. Though the rain had continued violent all night, we ventured to proceed. Heavy showers occurred all day; but when we proposed to spend the night at the Riet Valley, the friendly farmer advised us rather to push on, and, avoiding the Drift, which was by this time an unsafe fording-place, to cross the Sandhills, and drive along the beach. We followed his advice, found the beach a good hard road, and though the surf looked rather wild, and in some places rushed in upon us as high as the axle-trees, we got on well, Mr. Melville and his groom Jephtha riding before us. By God's mercy, we passed safely through the little Drift, and the broad sheet of water at the Great Salt river, which were both of considerable depth.

6th. My friend, Mr. Hancke, informed me, that owing to the rough weather, the Brilliant had not been able to take all her cargo on board, and would not sail as soon as first intended. All our baggage was yet on shore, which afterwards proved of advantage to me.

I was engaged all day in visiting my friends. At the Colonial Office I called upon Colonel Bird to thank him for the many civilities experienced from him during my stay in the colony. The Governor was not at home, but in the evening, wrote a note to inquire, whether I would return to England in the Zebra sloop of war. In answer, I informed his Excellency, that I had taken my passage on board the Brilliant brig, Captain Young.

We spent a very pleasant evening with the Rev. Mr. Hesse, where we met the Rev. Mr. Thom, who declared his intention of making a journey into the interior, to visit Kango cave, and endeavour to ascertain the geographical position of sundry places. His object also was to preach to the Hottentots and slaves, wherever he might find an opportunity.

6th. After breakfast, having received a note from his Excellency, I waited upon him at the Government-house. He observed, that he deserved no thanks for offering me a passage on board the Zebra, as he was seeking his own profit by it, wishing me to accompany his son Plantagenet, who was going to England in that vessel. I felt greatly distressed not to be able immediately to comply with his wish, the more so, as it was my duty, to show, by every means consistent with prior obligations, my gratitude to him for the great kindness he had shown me, during my stay in the colony. The engagement I had made with Captain Young was easily dissolved, but my promise to take home the son of my friend Bonatz seemed an insurmountable obstacle. It is needless here to enter into a detail of the conversations and negotiations that passed on this subject, suffice it to say, that though the father's disappointment and uneasiness were great, on first mentioning to him his Excellency's proposals, yet as both he, and the rest of my companions, were desirous, that I might yield to the Governor's wishes, an arrangement was made, by which I was set at liberty, to the entire satisfaction of the father, to whom I considered myself bound by previous promise. The Captain was a man, in whose faithfulness he could place full reliance, and a family, going home as passengers on board the Brilliant, were willing to pay every attention to his son. Having paid the Captain half of the passage-money, I put myself under the direction of the Governor, and of Captain Henry Forbes, commander of the Zebra, to whom his Excellency had previously introduced me. The Zebra was to sail on the 20th.

8th. Though the termination of this affair had been completely satisfactory to all parties, yet some gloomy thoughts continued to haunt my mind, regarding the extraordinary situation, into which I had been so unexpectedly thrown. Nor did I willingly part with my young friend Adolph, whose affectionate disposition and good sense had made his constant attendance in my various walks about Groenekloof very pleasant to me. But as I verily believe that nothing happens to me, but by the permission of God, to whom I have fully committed myself in all my ways, I endeavoured to "cast my burden upon the Lord," and to believe, that all things would work together for my good. Of this I have now made full experience.

Mr. and Mrs. Melville set out this morning for Groenekloof. After they were gone, we went to the parade, where the military were drawn up to receive General Sir Alexander Campbell. I spent a good part of the forenoon with Mr. Poleman, in whose company I always receive much pleasure and information. We dined at home, to celebrate Mr. Grant's birth-day, and spent the evening most agreeably with the Rev. Mr. Hesse. He and his family were going into the country, and fearing, that I should not see them again, I took leave of them.

9th. This day was devoted to a trip to Constantia. Mr. Hancke was the contriver and director of this excursion. He had provided two sociables and six. The company consisted of Mr. Hancke, a lady of his acquaintance, Brother Schmitt and his wife, Brother

Bonatz and his son, and myself. We set out at six o'clock, and took the road by Newlands. The weather was delightful. The oaks and other foreign trees were fast getting into leaf, and throughout all nature, spring showed itself swiftly approaching.

Our Conductor ordered the carriages to proceed by a road, which gave us a view of several romantic situations. We passed through the Wynberg-camp, a place I was glad to see, as having been the residence of our late missionary, P. Kohrhammer, when, in 1805, he was appointed Chaplain to the Hottentot regiment by Governor Jansen. The camp lies in an elevated situation, and is considered the most healthy spot in the neighbourhood of Capetown. The soldiers are quartered in barracks. An extensive prospect opens from hence across the Cape Downs, towards the mountains of Stellenbosch and Simon's Bay.

About half-past nine we arrived at the house of Mr. Colin, one of the proprietors of Constantia and son-in-law to Mr. Cloete, by whose family we were kindly and hospitably received. After a short introductory conversation, we walked out to see the gardens. They lie in a hollow, below the house, and are laid out in the Dutch style, with a covered walk. The vineyards are situated on an eminence, gently sloping towards the east. Many of the vines are old, and will be removed next year, to make room for others. They are without spaliers or poles, standing singly, like currant-bushes in a garden. The rich, sweet, Constantia wine grows only within a certain boundary. Mr. Colin, junior, pointed out a hedge, behind which, all attempts to raise the same grape have failed.

We now walked across part of a farm, belonging to Mr. Sebastian Van Rhenen, who is preparing to make vineyards, and hopes, in a few years, successfully to vie with Messrs. Cloete and Colin, as he supposes the soil to be of the same quality. On the road we met a Hottentot boy, who had just killed a black serpent, about five feet long, and an inch and a half in diameter.

After a pleasant walk, we reached Mrs. Van Helstinge's house. The old lady received us very politely, and insisted upon our tasting all the different wines made on her property. Among them were Hahnen Pootgen, white and red; Frontiniac; Klipp-wine, and another, of a rough taste. From her garden, a charming view presents itself. A narrow, woody glen, with a pretty villa at the farther end, belonging to one of her relations, runs up to the south-east side of the Table Mountain. Over the woods to the left, are seen the rocks and mountains forming Hout-bay. Near the dwelling, an avenue of large oaks affords some shade, but little attention has been paid, either to convenience or elegance.

We returned through a forest of Witteboom, in which the late storm had done much mischief. Many hundred trees were thrown down, or torn up by the roots. On our return, Mr. Colin took us into his cellar, or rather warehouse, a long building, containing casks holding several tuns of wine, standing upon racks, in rows, down each side, leaving a wide passage between them. In the centre stands a table, set round with sophas and chairs, where the company is regaled with some of the choicest Constantia, at the fountain-head.

After dinner, as soon as the cloth was removed, a merry fellow entered the room, took a chair, and seating himself between two ladies, began to talk, laugh, and drink wine, as if he were one of the party. This man was an old slave, of a frolicsome turn, kept for the amusement of the family. He addressed me, in gibberish, which I did not understand, but suppose I lost no instruction by it. Though his office seemed to be that of a jester, kept to fill up the vacuities occurring in African conversation, his presence was very annoying. Much rather would we have seen the natural grimaces and tricks of a tame baboon, generally holding the same situation with many farmers in the interior, than such a prostitution of human intellect.

After dinner, we visited Mr. Cloete. His house, which is not far from that of his son-in-law, is situated on an eminence, commanding an extensive prospect over the Cape Downs, to the Hangeklip, on False-bay. The house and premises are well built, and prove the long-existing wealth of the owners.

Constantia was built and settled by the celebrated Governor, Van Stell, the founder of Stellenbosch, who, by his superior sense and liberal mind, proved a great promoter of the welfare of this colony. He named the place Constantia, in honour of his wife, that being her Christian name. He was a man of great activity; enterprising, and generous. Many of the best situations in the colony owe their origin to him. But it is said, that the Company gained nothing under him, as he studied only his own private interest. Be it so; they have, however, been great gainers by the effects of his industry, and, no doubt, he deserved to reap the benefit of his talents, while he lived. Two statues, in niches, one over the door of the mansion, and the other over the cellar-door, are intended to represent the lady Constantia.

After walking out to see the vineyards, which are very extensive, we spent an hour in pleasant conversation. The cellar is constructed like that of Mr. Colin, and his wine not superior.

Adjoining the cellar, is a room with a billiard-table. From the back-door, a flight of stone steps leads to a brook in a close vale.

Mr. Cloete has always been a friend to the missionaries at Groenekloof, and was some time ago their neighbour. He is now lame, and thought, that he could not return the visit, at Groenekloof.

A large grove of old oaks, planted in quincunx, affords shade to the premises, and the plantations are kept in good order. There is an appearance of ancient grandeur about the place, which pleased us much. In the hall stands a stalactite, taken out of a cave near Caledon, about eight or nine feet in length. It is set upon its broad top, and narrowing fast towards the middle, made a Dutchman think that its beauty consisted in its resemblance to a huge candlestick, with the candle in it. That vitiated taste, however, is fast declining among the Dutch, and nature is no longer outraged as formerly, when trees and hedges, cut into all manner of shapes, constituted the beauty of a Dutch garden. At this absurdity we English laugh, while we are committing a far greater outrage, in cruelly maiming horses, dogs, and cats, by cutting off their tails and ears, to improve their beauty!

After taking a dish of tea in the English fashion, we bid adieu to our hospitable host, and returned to town. The evening of this bright and very hot day, turned out so cold, that we were glad to get soon housed, and comfortably seated at Mrs. Disandt's fire-side.

10th. I had a long conversation at the Government-house with the Rev. Mr. Hough, and afterwards with his Excellency in his study. We dined with Mr. Sebastian Van Rhenen, and spent the rest of the day agreeably with our friends.

12th. I dined with the Governor. A mail having arrived from England, much interesting intelligence was communicated. Captain Forbes informed me, that the Zebra would come round to Table bay at the end of the week, and that I might entertain hopes of soon following the Brilliant. I then prepared to return to Groenekloof, where I intended patiently to wait, till summoned to go on board.

14th. Having paid several short farewell-visits, we left Capetown in Mr. Slabbert's waggon, with ten horses in hand.

When we arrived at the Drift, near the Riet Valley, seven oxen were lying dead on its bank. They belonged to a waggon with fourteen, which had attempted to cross the Drift, when, by advice of the farmer, we took the road along the beach, as mentioned above (p. 337). The water being very deep, and the stream too powerful, the poor creatures were taken off their feet. The waggon was saved with difficulty, and seven of the fourteen oxen were drowned. The carcasses had been skinned, and left to the wolves and jackals. Our horses took fright at the disgusting sight, and set off with us into the bushes, but the skill of our driver soon brought them again into order.

CHAPTER XXII.

Sailing of the Brilliant. Iron plough. Sea-coast near Gaensekraal, Mr. Dashwood's farm. Shells used for lime. Account of the Dünen. Waxberry bushes, and manner of boiling wax. Laatste Stuiver. Brick-making. Visit Papkiills-fonteyn, Wolfskloof, Bürger's post, and Langefonteyn. Sand-flies. Arrival of Gnadenthal masons. Mr. Melville. Second farewell at Groenekloof. Hottentots manner of setting a brick-kiln. Departure from Groenekloof.

SEPTEMBER 15th. My return to Groenekloof was unexpected; but I was again welcomed with much cordiality, both by the missionaries and the Hottentots.

By a letter from Brother Bonatz, we were informed that the Brilliant sailed to-day. The sailing of this vessel raised the first serious disquietude in my mind, as I had very slight hopes of soon following and overtaking her, before she reached England. Pleasant as my stay at the Cape has been, yet, thinking that I had executed my commission, I now felt somewhat restless, wishing to return to my duties at home.

17th. I rode with Brother Fritsch to the Groote Post, to show him the new iron plough mentioned above, (p. 322), hoping that it might, with advantage, be introduced at Groenekloof, where agriculture is yet conducted after the Hottentot fashion. Mr. Croucher being absent, a serjeant of dragoons attended us. We looked at several ploughs of English construction, and I was glad to be informed, that the manufactory, established here, cannot furnish them fast enough for the increasing calls from the interior. Some have lately been sent to Uitenhagen. This shows an increase of good sense, and a decrease of prejudice in favour of the old, clumsy, wooden, Hottentot plough.

On our road home, we passed through the Klüberfalg, the residence of Mr. Duckett.

18th. Mr. Duckett, jun. called upon us, with an invitation from his father to dinner. As I expected every day to be my last at Groenekloof, we declined it, but in the afternoon, Brother Schmitt took a ride with me to his house. The road leads through the upper or eastern part of the village. After passing the Elephant-stones, the valley is narrow, but rich and fertile, and Mr. Duckett, being an excellent farmer, makes the most of it. The low hills to the right, are adorned with a profusion of wild bushes, with huge blocks of granite, fancifully dispersed among them. Their summits are crowned with assemblages of the same stone, forming broken rocks. We saw Mr. Duckett in his garden, alighted, and joined him. Groenekloof being this year, rather scantily supplied with garden-produce, he kindly offered, out of his abundance, to give us what we might send for.

When we arrived at the house, we were kindly received by Mrs. Duckett, who treated us with the most friendly attention. The conversation turned upon improvements in farming, and furnished an opportunity of removing some misunderstanding. Perceiving, that I was an admirer of natural curiosities, Mr. Duckett presented me with the tail of a pylstort, (arrow-tail), a fish caught in Simon's-bay. The tail itself is slender, and about fourteen inches in length. From the upper part of its insertion into the body, proceed two sharp bones, serrated on both sides, placed above each other, the lower, three, the upper, two inches long, which the fish can turn in any direction, inflicting a most severe and dangerous wound on its enemy. Every tooth of this bony saw acts as a barb, and if once inserted, cannot be extracted without great laceration of the flesh. It attacks sharks and other large fish with impunity, as all dread the experiment of having their throats pierced by such formidable weapons. The specimen given to me, was taken with a shark.

I was glad to have paid this visit, which seemed, for the future, to ensure the friendship of a very respectable neighbour.

19th. This morning, Mr. Fisher, the mason, with a party of our own Hottentots, and a slave belonging to Mr. Schroeder, began to work at the foundation of the new church. The huge stones, brought from the aloë-garden, now came into use, and were placed in the trench. They form a foundation unusually strong. Though I was much engaged with writing, I could not forbear going out sometimes to see the people at work, and was highly gratified with their cheerful diligence. In the evening, Brother Bonatz returning from the Cape, brought me the unpleasant intelligence, that the Zebra would not sail before the beginning of October.

20th. Though it rained all day, our Hottentot masons went on with their work at the foundation. In the evening, a Government messenger arrived, on his way to Saldanha bay. He had fallen from his horse and hurt his thigh and arm, but found here relief and good quarters. Two plans of the front of the new church, one proposed by the builder, Mr. Schroeder, and the other by Mr. Melville, were submitted to the family. The latter, being the most tasteful, was unanimously approved; a decision worthy to be imitated by parish-vestries and building-committees, in our own enlightened country. I was desired to write to Gnadenthal and encourage the Hottentots, to come to the assistance of their brethren in forwarding the work.

21st. Mr. Melville accompanied me on a walk through the settlement. We conversed with several families, and I thought I perceived a rising disposition for the improvement of their grounds, which deserves encouragement.

22d. A young woman departed this life in the faith of Christ, bearing witness to all present of the happiness of those, who find mercy, and obtain assurance of their being accepted, through His merits and all-sufficient atonement. Her funeral was attended by a numerous company. Brother Schmitt addressed himself particularly to the young people, whom he exhorted to follow the example of their deceased friend, to forsake the world with its vanities and pollutions, and to press forward to the attainment of that same faith and hope of eternal life, which had supported her during a lingering illness, and in the awful moment of death, and enabled her to leave the world, rejoicing in her God and Redeemer. His serious and affectionate discourse seemed to make a deep impression on the audience. The funeral was conducted with the greatest order and devotion, as described in my account of Gnadenthal, (p. 92).

23d. Having written a letter to the congregation at Gnadenthal, as requested above, Brother Stein set out this morning, as our envoy, to convey our wishes to our Brethren, and to the Hottentots, in that settlement. Immanuel went with him, as groom. The weather turning out fine, the Brethren Schmitt and Fritsch accompanied me to Gaensekraal, near the sea coast, on a visit to Mr. Dashwood. The road is uninteresting, leading through a barren, sandy wilderness, with not a cultivated spot on either side. But the bountiful Creator has likewise here clothed the waste with an incomparable profusion of flowers, which, in some places, cover the sand between the bushes, as with a rich carpet. We discovered several tortoises waddling along, and took up five, being varieties of the same species, but of different shades of colouring. One was new to us, having protuberances on the seams enclosing each compartment of the shell.

To our great disappointment, we found an empty house at Gaensekraal. We therefore left our prey and our great coats with a dragoon, and proceeded through a level country, overgrown with large bushes, to the sea-coast. The mole-holes not a little annoyed us and our horses. Several antelopes started up close to us, and the nearer we approached the coast, the more dense was the thicket, so as to render it difficult to penetrate to the water's edge, which, where nearest, may be about two miles from the farm. Many speckbooms, olive, and milk-bushes, are intermixed with the rhinoceros bushes, in wild confusion. The coast is not high, but rocky, with a broken beach and sand. A strong westerly wind caused a considerable swell and surf, which, after dismounting on the beach, kept us at a respectful distance from the advancing surges. On their retreat, we discovered a fine hard sand, but durst not venture to walk upon its smooth surface. An innumerable quantity of large muscles cover the coast everywhere, mixed here and there with the beautiful sea-ear and other shells, peculiar to these regions, but all in a broken state. The shells are brought by cart-loads to the farms, and burnt in kilns, as lime for mortar. The rocks are a dark-grey shistus, with narrow veins of quartz.

Finding it too troublesome to lead the horses more than about an English mile over the rough shells and pebbles, we returned to Gaensekraal. The sandy road exhibited the fresh track of a wolf. This bushy coast is infested by wolves and leopards, which commit many depredations in the neighbouring farms.

While we rested at the house, I wrote a letter to Mr. Dashwood, to explain a mistake respecting a strange Hottentot in his service, who pretended to belong to Groenekloof. This fellow having been guilty of pilfering, in his flight, passing through Groenekloof, left the stolen property on the roof of a cottage, which caused the inhabitant to be suspected by Mr. Dashwood, as being in league with the thief, though quite ignorant of the transaction. Mr. Dashwood expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the explanation given, and I felt anxious to remove the unpleasant impression made by misrepresentation, purposely employed by a known enemy to the Mission, in the mind of a man, who always had been well-disposed towards it.

Gaensekraal is a good farm; the buildings are superior to many in the country, and the grounds extensive, but bare of trees. The little wood, which formerly adorned the premises, was cut down, under an idea, that it harboured birds, particularly a kind of starlings, that do great mischief in the fields. But nowhere have I seen such flights of these birds as in Mr. Dashwood's grounds. Thus the place had been robbed of its beauty, to little purpose. On our journey home, we did not see one tortoise to add to our collection, but some curious beetles and lizards.

24th. Every morning I am greeted by the pleasant chirping of two swallows, cock and hen, which have a nest in a corner of the room, under the cieling. There is hardly a room, kitchen, or out-house in the country without these inmates, and it would be thought next to murder to kill them. They build their nests of clay, in the shape of a bottle, the bottom being fixed to the wall, and the neck serving for the entrance. Into these bottle-shaped nests, they convey the softest down. As far as I was able to watch them, both cock and hen assist in the construction, or repairs of the nest, which remains for their use during their emigration. The same birds always return to the same nests, and if it happens, that by white-washing the room, the outside of the nest has been whitened, they carefully cover about half the length of the neck with fresh clay, before they make a new bed.

As the upper half of the room-door, generally stands open during the day, they go in and out whenever they please, but if the door is shut, they give notice of their wish to go abroad, to fetch either materials or food, by a gentle piping and flying about the room, and none think it too troublesome to let them out. At dawn of day, they are heard chirping their morning-song, before they leave the nest. I have often left my bed, to open the door for them.

These birds are shaped like the European swallows, but, under their wings, of a red-brown colour. They leave the country during the winter. They are persecuted by a bird called the wild swallow, black and white in colour, which is said to kill the domestic one, and sieze upon its nest. The wild are on that account shot, or otherwise destroyed by the Hottentots.

This being Sister Schmitt's birth-day, the Hottentots, particularly the girls belonging to her school, did every thing in their power to show their affection and esteem for her, and I was again delighted with the sincere and well-merited expression of their gratitude for her faithfulness and kindness towards them.

We had an agreeable visit from Mr. Stoll, landdrost of the Cape district, Dr. Liesching, and Mr. Gieh, who walked through every part of the settlement with approbation. It afforded a desirable opportunity of giving explanations, and rectifying some erroneous notions.

25th. Having heard much of the singular appearance of the range of Dünen, or sand-hills, along the coast, I rode thither with Brother Fritsch, and was struck with surprise, when we entered among them. Their appearance from Groenekloof is rather unpleasant, and not unlike a low sandy dyke, skirting the waste in a straight line. But I found them occupying a very wide field, extending to several miles from the sea-coast. The fine sand, which is chiefly pulverized quartz, and as white as snow, is here blown about, like sleet on a frozen surface, forming hillocks of considerable height, and in shape, resembling huge drifts of snow. The flats between them are destitute of any verdure, the surface being almost constantly in motion. To-day the south-east wind blew pretty strong, and small parallel ridges were continually forming over the whole surface, by its operation upon the sand. In other parts, especially where deep recesses or glens are defended by the hillocks, the waxberry-bush has found shelter, and grows in great abundance. To a superficial observer, it appears not unlike box. Some of the stems are as thick as a man's leg, and the bushes from eight to ten feet in height.

Our path wound round between the hillocks, sometimes over soft sand, through which the horses waded heavily, and again over a hard bottom, like frozen snow. In a deep glen, we saw several of our people from Groenekloof, diligently employed in gathering wax-berries. They sent a little boy to show us the way to a place surrounded by high banks, where they had erected a hut, and kept their apparatus for boiling the berries, and extracting the wax. The renters of the neighbouring farms claim a right to this property, and our people were required to ask their permission to gather the berries. Though this had been done, a man had yesterday warned off the women engaged in boiling wax; they had therefore hid their iron pot, for fear of seizure. But on discovering us to be friends, they produced it, and showed us the process, which is perfectly simple. The pot is hung over the fire, by running a thick stick through its handle, which is supported at each end, by a fork placed in the ground, at a convenient distance from the fire. After the berries have boiled some time, the wax appears on the surface of the water, and is skimmed off with a spoon. Two kinds of wax-berry bushes grow here, one smaller than the other. The berries of both, have much the appearance of those of the juniper.

From hence we rode to the Laatste Stuiver, a parcel of land containing much sweet grass, and wax-berry bushes, for the possession of which the missionaries had applied to Government, that they and their Hottentots might have a change of food for the cattle. But it had already been advertised to be disposed of to the best bidder.

27th. In the afternoon, I walked out to see the brick-makers. A number of girls had offered their services, to place the new-made bricks in rows to dry, and as amusement accompanied the work, nothing could exceed their diligence. Some, who think working in their fields and gardens a labour too great to be supported for any length of time, work here and in the quarry, for many hours successively, with a zeal, activity, and good-humour, which surprised me. Hitherto the weather had favoured us, but most of the bricks, in drying, cracked by the heat of the sun. This was afterwards avoided, by different management in mixing the clay.

During the latter days of the month, I spent my time chiefly at my desk, relieved by a daily morning-walk to the masons' and brick-makers, and an evening's visit to the quarry, which proved more and more productive.

October 2d. Brother Fritsch rode with me to Papkülls-fonteyn farm, inhabited by a friendly neighbour. We took the road round Cruywagens-kraal hill, crowned like others, with loose masses of granite, some of which have fanciful shapes. Not finding our friend at home, we conversed some time with the family at the door, without quitting our horses. They showed us a young cub of a baboon, brought from the mountain, which of all creatures I have yet seen, was the most frightfully disgusting object, and in its manners equally unpleasant, squeaking, jabbering, and twinkling its eyes in a head and wrinkled face, too large for the body.

We kept on the north-side of the hills with the immense waste of Zwartland to our right, and beyond it the beautiful ranges of mountains from the Piquetberg to the Hangeklip. At the back of the Lauwesklouf hill, is the Wolsklouf, into which we penetrated as far as we were able. The singular rocks or fragments of stone lying, or standing upright, either on the summit or declivity, deserve notice. Cattle were feeding among the bushes, and, as the herdsmen informed us, safely, though the whole region is considered as the haunt of wolves and tygers. Several ledges of rocks, which overhang dells, filled with high bushes, form here snug retreats for wild beasts of every description. Formerly it was a noted haunt, and now and then, one of the above-mentioned animals is seen and hunted in the klouf. From hence we rode to the Burgers Post, and paid a short visit to Mr. Eckstein. On the road, Brother Fritsch was thrown from his horse, and we were thankful, that no harm was done.

In the afternoon, the Governor with his usual retinue, passed through our premises. He informed me that Captain Forbes, in going to Simon's bay, had met with a severe fall, which would confine him for some days, but that the first lieutenant would bring the ship round to Table Bay.

3d. Brother Stein, having returned from Gnadenthal, gave us a very interesting account of his visit. Many Hottentots, on hearing my letter, had declared their intention to come and help their brethren here in the building of the new church. I much regretted, that I had not accompanied him. During the forenoon, I rode with Brother Schmitt to Langefonteyn, to pay a farewell-visit to our worthy friend, Mr. Dirk Slabbert, but we did not find him at home. The sun shining very warm, we were much troubled with a species of sand-fly, which fixes upon the face, ears, and neck, if not defended by crape or some other means, to the great annoyance of travellers.

4th. Our good-natured Hottentots, perceiving that I had begun to collect serpents, brought me several kinds, among which were the nachtschlange, (night-serpent); earth-serpent; eyerfreter, (egg-eater); schaapesteker, (sheep-stinger); and cobra di capella.

5th. Brother Schmitt went to town, to attend a sale of iron, and several articles, useful for the building. I had the pleasure of Mr. Melville's company, who was still diligently employed in measuring the whole district of Groenekloof. Several Hottentot workmen arrived from Gnadenthal, for whose board and lodging provision had been made. They visited all the missionaries on the 6th, and expressed their willingness to assist in building the church, and their happiness to make acquaintance with their Groenekloof brethren, in a manner, which gave me renewed pleasure, for it was a display of that union of heart, which exists among real Christians of all classes. In their behaviour, that blessed truth seemed, in a great degree, established, that the "fruits of the Spirit are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." Nothing surely is more encouraging, than to behold these effects of the preaching of the gospel to the heathen, as sure proofs, that it has been received in faith.

7th. Mr. Melville was obliged to leave us for some time. We parted from each other with mutual regret. I shall ever remember with gratitude to God, by what unforeseen circumstances we were made acquainted with each other, that he might be led to accompany us on our reconnoitring-journey into the interior. In a variety of ways, his presence afforded us assistance, comfort, and delight, and I pray, that he may be rewarded with a full enjoyment of every temporal and spiritual blessing.

8th. In the morning at two o'clock, Brother Schmitt returned from the Cape, and informed me, that the Zebra was to sail on Sunday next. This made me resolve to go to-morrow to Capetown, to be in readiness. In the forenoon, Mr. Slabbert, in his travelling-waggon and ten horses, passing through Groenekloof to the Cape, offered to take me with him, but the missionaries prevailed upon me to decline it, and to follow in the morning on horseback; nor was my impatience to proceed homeward powerful enough, to repress the rising regret I felt at parting a second time from friends, endeared to me by so many considerations.

I spent the greater part of the day in once more walking through the settlement, and visiting its inhabitants. I was accompanied by one or other of the missionaries in my different walks. The Hottentots, at work at the brick-kiln, gave me a last proof of their attachment to old habits. While I was watching their setting it up, a boor, who is much engaged in the same work, came riding towards us, and began to take them to task: "You must do so and so," said he; "you know nothing about setting up a kiln, your bricks will never get burnt, &c." To every sentence, their answer was, "Ya, Mynheer! Ya, Mynheer!" Having finished his lecture, the boor rode off in a gallop, but was no sooner out of hearing, than they began to make their remarks: "That man," said they, "thinks himself very wise, because he is a rich boor; but we must do our own way, or the bricks will never be burnt. His bricks are accustomed to his way, but our bricks can only be burnt in our way." They seem to have been in the right, for I have since heard, that their kiln answered perfectly well, and their bricks were remarkably good.

In the evening-meeting at the chapel, Brother Schmitt once more commended me to the blessing and protection of God, in fervent prayer, and the congregation again expressed their best wishes for me.

9th. I rose, intending to set out early, to prevent any stir, but in vain. The Hottentots came early to bid me a last adieu, and to show their affection, by every token of good-will. Young and old would give me their hands, and then joined in singing a farewell-hymn. The missionaries likewise assembled, as before, and I truly felt the value of their love and intercession. Every one of them has shown the greatest kindness towards me, and none, with more unabated faithfulness and zeal, than Brother Schmitt and his wife, with whom I have spent most of my time at the Cape. But it is time to set bounds to my expressions of gratitude towards them, which may already appear to some of my readers tedious and impertinent.

About half past seven o'clock, I left Groenckloof, accompanied by Brother Schmitt as far as Brakfonteyn. There I parted from that worthy man, who returned to his zealous and indefatigable labours. May God's blessing attend him yet for many years, with health and strength, equal to his devotedness and desire to serve the cause of his Saviour, either here, or in any other part of South Africa. Brother Fritsch proceeded with me to the Cape. We halted about an hour at Mr. Beester's house at the Riet Valley, and though it began to rain hard, rode on, and arrived, thoroughly soaked, with our friends, at Mrs. Disandt's house, where we were received with their wonted kindness and cordiality.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Capetown. Visits to friends. Mr. and Mrs. Sheridan. Arrangements on board the Zebra. Rev. Mr. Hesse's return to Europe regretted at the Cape. Duties of a Lutheran minister. Pedestrian expedition round the Lion's head. Visit the country-residences of Messrs. Horak, Beck, Ziegler and Dr. Liesching. View of the coast to the south. Final conversations with the Governor. Mr. Wilberforce Bird. Take leave, and go on board the Zebra. Manner of receiving the Governor on board.

OCTOBER 10th. I waited on Captain Forbes at the Government-house, and obtained a letter from him to the first lieutenant of the Zebra, with which I went on board, accompanied by Mr. Daniel Disandt, and Brother Fritsch, to see the accommodations prepared for me. I found them quite sufficient for my purpose. By the Captain's kind attention to my wishes, I had a small cabin to retire into, which held my bed, a chair, and wash-stand; besides being with the Captain during the day. After my return, I went with Mr. Hancke to pay some visits, and spent as much time as I could with my worthy friends, the Rev. Mr. Hesse and Mr. Poleman. I dined with the Governor, and there met Mr. and Mrs. Sheridan. With the latter, I had much pleasant conversation. The party then attended an instrumental concert, given by Mr. Lemming. When we entered the hall, "God save the king" was played, in honour of his Excellency, as the King's representative. I admired Mr. Lemming's performance on the violin; the band consisted partly of dilettanti.

11th. Time was too short to attend to all the engagements made, but we spent a very agreeable afternoon with the Rev. Mr. Hesse, Mr. Poleman being of the party.

12th. In the morning, Brother Fritsch returned to Groenekloof.

I felt a peculiar pang at parting from the last of my dear Cape Brethren. I then walked towards the Government-house, to finally settle with Captain Forbes about my going on board, but was met by the Governor, who informed me, that precisely at day-break, on Wednesday morning, the Zebra would leave the bay. This prolongation of time I wished to improve as much as possible, in the enjoyment of the company and conversation of friends.

13th. In the forenoon, Mr. Edward Grant and Mr. D. Disandt accompanied me on board the Zebra, where we met Captain Forbes and several officers. I found every attention paid to my convenience. Into my little private cabin, sufficient light is admitted by a bull's eye.

I dined at the Rev. Mr. Hesse's, who entered upon the subject of his intended return to Europe. Mr. Poleman, anxious to retain so valuable a character at the Cape, made friendly remonstrances, which led our friend into a detail, to show his reasons for taking such a step. They were sufficiently cogent. To me it was interesting, on this occasion, to obtain some information concerning the duties of a Lutheran minister, which are by no means small, nor in their performance optional. Far from wishing to withdraw from these obligations, Mr. Hesse lamented, that the indifference of the congregation had long ago caused many of them, which were formerly considered as of the greatest importance, to be abandoned, and that, if the minister were entirely to relax in the performance of his duties, it would give to most of them very little concern. He is now required once a year to visit the families in their dwellings, in company of an ouderling or deacon. This is generally done about Passion-week, but by many of his parishioners considered an intrusion.

They have, however, built a spacious parsonage-house, and a large, handsome church, and in general, behave towards their minister with generous attention to his comforts. Externally, therefore, our reverend friend had no hopes of a better situation, but that was not his object. The state of his health also, and the education of his children seemed to require his return. My long visit to this colony, had made me so far participate in its welfare, that I joined Mr. Poleman in his objections, as both his congregation, the public, and our Mission, will experience great loss by Mr. Hesse's removal. During my last stay at Capetown, I made a point of returning home every evening to supper, that I might enjoy the society of my worthy hostess, Mrs. Disandt, and her family.

14th. A pedestrian expedition round the Lion's head having been planned by Mr. Hancke, we were not deterred by the appearance of a rainy day, but having met at Mr. Poleman's house, set out. The company consisted of Messrs. Hancke, Poleman, Hesse, and myself. It was their intention to reach Weilerskloof to breakfast, but we could get no farther than Mr. Schmidt's on the north-east ascent of the hill. There a heavy shower kept us prisoners for some time, when we proceeded, in hopes of better weather. The air was clear, and, as we walked up the kloof, between the Lion's head and Table-Mountain, we had a good view of the town and bay. The summits of the mountains were enveloped in clouds. Amends, however, was made by the coolness of the air, which made walking pleasant. On reaching the top of the kloof, an extensive prospect rewards the traveller, and the range of rocks and precipices, forming the south-west side of Table-Mountain, with the promontories of Hout-bay have a grand appearance. Turning to the right, round the Lion's head, we arrived at a villa, belonging to Mr. Horak. This place, given to him by the Earl of Caledon, has been greatly improved, by clothing the steep ascent with plantations of Witteboom and other trees. The gardens surround the circular mansion in concentric circles. Behind the house, stone steps lead to a picturesque group of rocks. Here, under the shade of various trees, planted on every practicable shelf, and between the masses of stone, a cool retreat is afforded on a hot summer's day.

After some rest, and pleasant conversation with the owner, we continued our walk, on a good road, to the villa of Mr. Beck.

Rocks of singular shape hover over the dwelling. The gardens, which in terraces slope down towards the sea, are well stocked with a variety of flowers. By a continuation of the road, dug into the steep declivity of the mountain, we reached the villa of Dr. Liesching and Mr. Ziegler to dinner.

This is a romantic spot, with a great variety of garden-ground, laid out in terraces, down a very rugged kloof and containing a large collection of scarce plants and flowering shrubs. At the bottom of these grounds, the rocks form a grotto, in which is a cold bath. Walking alone on the heath, I found some singular groups of large stones, with the Lion's head above them, in profile, resembling a cupola, and to the south, an extensive view of the coast beyond Camp-bay and Hout-bay, of which I endeavoured to make a sketch. After dinner we returned to Capetown, in the doctor's barouche and four.

15th, I went to the Government-house, where I found Captain Forbes, who assured me, that he meant to set sail on the morning of the 16th. Having obtained admission to the Governor, I had a final, and very satisfactory conversation with his Excellency, on some points of importance to the Mission, and thus closed the business committed to me by the Directors of the Missionary concerns of our Church, with thankfulness to God, to whom alone I ascribe all my undeserved success.

I dined to-day with Mr. Wilberforce Bird, and met Dr. Hussey and a captain of artillery. Mrs. Bird made many inquiries concerning Mr. Wilberforce and his family, and I was delighted to hear that excellent man made the subject of conversation and just admiration. At nine o'clock, the company went to a ball at the Government-house. I returned home to my lodgings at Mrs. Disandt's.

16th. This being my last day at Capetown, I spent the morning in taking leave of my friends, Mr. Hancke, the Rev. Mr. Hesse, Mr. Poleman, and their families. While I live, I shall retain the most grateful sense of their kindness towards me.

Meeting Captain Forbes, he desired me to be ready at four o'clock, as he then expected the Governor to bring his son on board, and should immediately set sail.

After dinner, therefore, having taken a last farewell of my kind hostess, Mrs. Disandt, her family, and son-in-law, Mr. Edward Grant, whose presence has added much to the pleasure and comfort I always enjoyed in that house, I was accompanied to the pier by Mr. Hancke, Mr. Daniel Disandt, and Mr. Bestaendig. There I bid adieu to the former, with sentiments of the sincerest affection and gratitude for the essential and disinterested services he has rendered me, during the whole of my abode in the colony. The two latter gentlemen gave me the pleasure of their company, till we reached the ship. Stephen, a Hottentot from Groenekloof, by whom I had yesterday received letters, was on the pier, and saw me enter the boat, according to orders received.

When I arrived on board, I found every thing prepared to receive the Governor. The ship was dressed out with an awning and flags, and the table in the cabin covered with a profusion of viands. The first lieutenant being confined by a hurt, received some days ago, the second lieutenant had the command. Captain Forbes was on shore, and it was so settled, that if his gig returned without him, then the Governor would not come on board that afternoon. By some mistake the gig was reported to be coming off empty, and the lieutenant ordered the flags and awnings to be taken down. This was instantly done, when the gig was seen swiftly approaching the ship, with the Governor, his son, Miss Somerset, and the Captain in it. There was now no time, either for replacing the flags, or for firing a salute, before they were all on board. His Excellency seemed pleased with the ship, and the arrangements made, and sat down to the cold collation. When they returned to shore, a salute of seventeen guns was fired, a company of artillery on board performing that service. During the short conversation I had with his Excellency, he once more assured me of his favourable disposition towards the Mission; and added, that he still hoped that I should land in England before the passengers in the Brilliant. His prediction proved true.

The wind having turned right against us, and blowing fresh, the Captain resolved not to work against it so late in the evening, and returned with the Governor. I would not go again on shore, but spent the evening in writing.

Departure from Table-bay. View of the coast and mountains. Reflections. Contents of the Zebra. General Bonaparte's part of the cargo, Officers. Convenience of a private cabin. Letter to the Rev. Mr. Hesse, respecting the Church of the United Brethren. First appearance of St. Helena. Its rocky coasts. Visited by Captain Wallis of the Podargus sloop. Landing. James-town described. Morning-walk through the Governor's grounds.

OCTOBER 17th. About eight o'clock, Captain Forbes came on board with Mr. Somerset, Captain Cloete, and Major Blake. The two officers soon returned to shore. Every thing being prepared, we immediately set sail, and beat out of the harbour, the wind being right against us. The sky looked wild.

I stood on deck, engaged with various contemplations, but having so often, in the course of this narrative, expressed my feelings, they may be guessed at without the necessity of a tedious recapitulation. Though the heavens were beclouded, the air was clear, and the surrounding objects presented themselves distinctly to view;

Capetown, with its immense back-ground of mountains, or rather huge cliffs, shelving off towards the south; and to the east, the beautiful outline of mountains from the Hangeklip to the Piquetberg, enclosing the Tigerberg, Kuhberg, Blauberg, and Groenekloof hills. On the latter, my spirit seemed to hover with a mixture of pleasure and pain, and my prayers arose for a blessing on all, whom I have there left behind. My spirit then fled over the mountains of Hottentot's Holland into the sacred groves of Gnädenthal, and I felt a pang on reflecting, that, by being kept in constant suspense during the last two months, I have been prevented paying another visit to those who dwell under their shade.

As we were a long time working out of the bay, I quietly enjoyed these reveries for some hours, till the more restless waves of the open sea began to affect me; and feeling myself quite overpowered by a kind of giddiness, I was glad to reach my private cabin, and take to my bed, out of which, after a restless night, I could hardly crawl into the great cabin on the 18th, when I felt only half alive. Meanwhile the wind had turned in our favour, and we had made one hundred and twenty six miles by twelve o'clock, going at the rate of nine and ten knots an hour. I began already to comfort myself with some faint hopes of our being not much behind the Brilliant, when she reached England.

19th. I had spent a miserable night; the breeze freshened so much, that the rolling of the ship became very troublesome. A soldier, who had obtained a free passage as Captain's servant, was particularly anxious to render me every assistance; and, during the whole voyage, considered himself as attached to me. He attended me every morning, and seemed even to watch my wishes, that I might never want any thing. His name was John M'Klosky. By twelve o'clock, we had made two hundred and twenty miles. Thankfulness for such swift progress, made me quite satisfied with all the tumbling and rolling we had to endure. The wind abated a little, but remained fair.

20th. The articles of war were read, and a general muster and inspection of the crew took place, as is usual on Sundays.

21st. Being restored to a tolerable state of health and spirits, I began to notice the contents of our ship, and the heterogenous nature of the objects brought together. General Bonaparte's property filled great part of the deck, and as it has been insinuated, that he was left in a starving condition, it may not be uninteresting to know, what the Zebra alone added to his store, of which I took some account, a hundred bags of corn and oats, twelve bales of hay, ten casks of wine, six barrels of butter, and forty or fifty sheep, several of which died on the passage. Every man of war, sailing from the Cape, was charged with some articles, either of provision or manufacture, for this celebrated captive. But how are the mighty fallen! Fallen indeed, in every sense, even in mind, so as not to be able to restrain a species of fretfulness, which leads him to encourage complaints, founded on falsehood. Bonaparte's goods were all marked with a Bp, by his own direction. Among other live stock on board, was a young jackal. This savage cub, a moment after he was brought on board, seeing an unfortunate cock walking on deck, siezed it by the neck, and sprang with it overboard, supposing the green ocean to be a field. The boat being out, both were soon taken up, and the jackal saved.

22d. The wind continued strong and fair, and all were thankful for the progress we made.

I shall ever remember with gratitude, the civility and kind attention of Captain Forbes and the officers of the Zebra. Many of them had seen much service, and fought nobly in their king and country's cause. Some had travelled to almost every part of the known world, and I could not fail to derive much entertainment and information from their occasional relations of remarkable events, which were always unaffected and unassuming. A passenger, Captain Brabyn of the infantry, who had spent sixteen years in New South Wales, and was obliged to visit England, to settle some family affairs, gave me much interesting information both of that singular country, and of my friend the Rev. Mr. Marsden. Thus I never felt time hang heavy on my hands. If I was not disposed to write or read, I always found such society and conversation on deck, as afforded me great gratification.

My little cabin was my sanctuary, and the hurry and noise in the gun-room seldom, if ever, disturbed me in my meditations. Whatever is not within my reach or controul, in things not quite consistent with religious propriety, I leave to Him, who judgeth righteously, not being answerable for what is not committed to me, or in my power to alter in the conduct of others. To reprove, in a spirit of Christian meekness and true charity, being more disposed to excuse and make allowances, than to find fault and judge severely, is certainly the duty of a true Christian, but the manner of doing it, with any hopes of success, is not the gift of every one, who feels the obligation. But there was not an officer on board, who would not take in good part, any remark made on subjects, on which we differed in sentiment or expression.

A small shelf had been put up in my cabin, which contained a few books. Every morning, when I awoke, the bull's eye giving me sufficient light, I read the Scripture-texts appointed for every day in our Church, with the two chapters from which they were taken, adding sometimes larger portions of the Scriptures, as I was led on, by the importance of the subjects; and the great delight and comfort I enjoyed in this practice. Never did the Bible appear to me so precious a treasure, when read with prayer, and under the enlightening influence of the Spirit of God, by whose divine assistance I was frequently led into a clearer understanding of many of the great truths contained in it, than I had ever before possessed. To enter largely upon the subject, would be here out of place, but I trust, some abiding impressions have been made upon my soul, during my solitary devotions in that narrow cell.

Every day, two officers were invited by the Captain to dinner, and, according to the usual practice in a man of war, the Captain dined with the officers on Sunday's, when Mr. Somerset and I were likewise invited.

25th. The wind becoming more moderate, the ship's motion permitted me to spend my time quietly in the cabin, preparing letters to send from St. Helena to the Cape. I began likewise to make a circumstantial report of all my proceedings at the Cape, for the Directors of our Missions.

26th. I wrote to my highly valued friend, the Rev. Mr. Hesse, at Capetown, having been led into a recapitulation of many subjects, which occurred in conversation between us at his house. Part of my letter related to the Church to which I belong. Concessions are the best defence, where we are, or have formerly been, to blame, in expressions or proceedings, founded on mistaken notions. Such concessions have been repeatedly made, but in general to little purpose; and we must be satisfied to hear the old, wretched, and contradictory accusations, repeated in "Accounts of all Religions, Encyclopedias, Notes on Church History," and other compilations. Be it so, since it cannot be otherwise expected; let us live them down, since we have not been able to write them down. To some, however, who wilfully continue to deal in that species of slander against the Brethren, or other religious communities, the answer of a friend of mine, a nobleman in Saxony, to his brethren, the States of Upper Lusatia, assembled at the Diet at Bautzen, may be given, consistently with truth. With a view to irritate his feelings, or, as the vulgar phrase is, to quiz him, they pretended to believe all the infamous stories, related by certain authors concerning the practices of the Brethren at Herrnhut, representing them as a very profligate and licentious sect; and challenged him to deny them. "Pray, gentlemen," he replied, "do not assert, that you believe these things, for I know you all so well, that if you really did believe, that all manner of licentiousness might be practised at Herrn-hut with impunity, there is not one of you, who would not long ago have requested to be received as a member of such a community."

27th. Evening-prayers were read in the cabin before dinner. While we were dining with the officers in the gun-room, the master came down with the good news, that St. Helena was in sight. The information was received with great coolness by the old mariners, and as we could not anchor there after sunset, we remained under an easy sail all night, standing off and on.

28th. I was early on deck, expecting to find a huge peak rising out of the sea, as St. Helena is often represented. I was surprised, therefore, to see a long, high, and, from that distance, smooth-looking land, exhibiting nothing striking or picturesque; but, as we approached, more of its peculiar features were visible, and its appearance became interesting. No coast I have ever seen, looks more desolate; and one may easily conceive the anguish of the ladies who accompanied Bonaparte, to have been as great as described, when they beheld the black dismal precipices, without a blade of grass or bush upon them, among which they were perhaps to spend the remainder of their lives. Several kloofs, (to keep up the old favourite appellation), divide the masses of ragged rocks. They appear filled with a black mould, the crumbling fragments of decomposed volcanic substances.

We soon discovered the Podargus sloop of war, cruising off the island, and, by signal, sailed towards her. Captain Wallis, her commander, came off in his boat, and paid a long visit to Captain Forbes.

On a nearer approach, several curious peaks, rocks of fanciful shape, and caverns near the sea, attracted my attention. The general colour of the rocks is dark-grey, with fissures and veins of a brown-yellow tint. Batteries are placed on several eminences, forming a line of defence all round the accessible part of the island. As we sailed round the point, James-town burst upon our view, with a neat church, clean-looking houses, and a row of trees near the beach. Some groves of cocoa and other trees adorn the gardens.

When we had come to an anchor, the officer of the guard came on board, with whom Mr. Somerset and Captain Forbes went on shore, to make arrangements. I preferred spending the day on board, wishing to write letters, and complete my journal. On their return, however, Captain Forbes, who had procured permission for me to land, reported, that having seen the Governor, Sir Hudson Lowe, he had invited him to dinner at Plantation-house, his country-residence, and that I might, meanwhile, find amusement of various kinds on shore. I was thus persuaded to accompany him.

The weather was so mild, that there was hardly any surf, which is sometimes very troublesome, even at the jetty. The landing-place lies under vast, and almost perpendicular rocks. About three hundred yards to the left, an abutment of the rock forms an arch, like that of a flying buttress. To the right, the road passes over a draw-bridge, along the beach, to a battery of heavy guns, commanding the entrance of the harbour. To the left, storehouses and offices range behind an avenue of trees, the stems of which are remarkably crooked and ill-grown.

About the middle of this range of buildings, a gate admits the traveller into the town, without any examination, but he is required immediately to repair to the town-major's office, to sign his name, and declare his business. Our first visit was to Captain Stansfield, the senior naval officer, acting as commodore, in absence of the admiral, Sir Pultney Malcolm.

I was received with great politeness by Captain Stansfield, and, as Sir Pultney had offered Captain Forbes a bed at his house, I was likewise provided with accommodations, as his companion. During his absence, I determined to spend the afternoon in examining the stones on the hills surrounding the town, being pretty sure, that I should find enough to amuse me for some hours, when the arrival of Sir Thomas Reade, the Adjutant-general, delivered me from the burden of my contrivances. When he heard the plan I had formed, he protested, that I should not quit my company, but accompany the captain and Mr. Somerset to Plantation-house to dinner. With the most obliging opposition to all my remonstrances, he fairly compelled me to join the cavalcade, and we set out with the Governor's adjutant, Lieutenant Pritchard, all well mounted.

The road up Ladder-hill is a steep zigzag, and were there not a parapet of about three feet in height skirting it towards the declivity, the view downwards would be frightful. At the top of the hill, a battery commands both the road, and the gate leading to it from the plain above. The mass of rocks, and the innumerable fragments lying on the hill, bear evident marks of their having once been in a state of fusion. The traces of that dreadful eruption, by which this singular island was lifted up above the surface of the ocean, appear in all directions. To the right, on the waste above, we were made particularly attentive to a number of gullies, in parallel lines, resembling torrents of burning lava. An attempt has been made to plant a hedge of Indian fig, on each side of the road, but it does not seem to thrive well.

Leaving High-knole, a steep conical hill, to the left, with a fort and guard on the summit, the whole face of the country changes from a wilderness to a garden. The declivities of the hills are covered with short grass of the most lively green, and their summits, with bushes and trees. On a plain below, the camp of the 66th regiment presented itself. It is called Francis-plain camp, and, as the military was just then on parade, the sound of martial music greeted our ears, as we rode along the hill. Plantation-house lies to the right, and is approached between two handsome lodges, with a guard-house, signal-house, and flags. The road leads through a grove to the main entrance. The house is a spacious building, facing an opening towards the sea, and bounded by low hills, planted with a variety of trees and bushes. An extensive lawn and garden slope down the gentle declivity.

On entering the drawing-room, we met a large company, chiefly officers of different regiments, now stationed in the island, waiting for the Governor. I confess I felt rather uncomfortable, not seeing Sir Thomas Reade arrive, to account for the appearance of a stranger among these military men in full dress. But when Sir Hudson entered the apartment, and Captain Forbes introduced me to him, his Excellency made me truly welcome, assuring me, that he should have felt much hurt, if I had not accompanied my friends. To my astonishment, I found here a gentleman, with whom I had contracted some acquaintance in England, Mr. Brook, Secretary to the colony.

Sir Thomas Reade having joined us, we sat down to dinner, twenty-one in number. The conversation was free, and conducted throughout with the most correct attention to propriety. Sir Hudson had the kindness to place me next to the Secretary, that we might renew our acquaintance. Lady Lowe had been confined about a month ago, and did not attend to-day. About nine o'clock the party broke up, and the moon shining bright, all the officers returned, either on foot or on horseback, to their stations in different parts of the island. Sir Hudson desired us to make his house our home.

29th. I awoke at day-break, and feeling no inclination to waste my time in sleep, in a place, so remarkable in itself, and rendered much more so by recent events, I instantly quitted my bed, and left the house before sunrise, to form acquaintance with as much of the surrounding country, as the time before breakfast would permit.

I first went to the pleasure-grounds. They are laid out in terraces, descending towards a valley, in which some cottages are inhabited by Chinese gardeners and labourers. A flower-garden, in the Dutch style, is preparing for Lady Lowe, who delights in curious plants. It is sheltered from the east wind, by a rock of a white gritty substance. My attention was for some time directed to an assemblage of stones, brought together for building. They were varieties of scoriæ, some containing chrystals of shoerl and olivin, and, as I apprehend, magnetic iron, quite similar in appearance to many I have seen from the neighbourhood of Ætna and Vesuvius. Some of the cavities were filled with a bright yellow coating, but I found no zeolith in any of them.

Pursuing my walk, under beautiful groves of trees of various descriptions, I arrived at the hill, which is covered with a young plantation of firs and other evergreens. From the upper walk observing a black rock at some distance, I made towards it, and found it to consist of amorphous basaltes. While I was employed, without proper tools, in knocking off some specimens, the barking of a dog at the door of a neighbouring house, brought out the proprietor, with whom I had some conversation.

Turning down a footpath to the bottom of the rock, I found a quarry, and in it a vein of a substance, by the Germans called Steinmark (stone-marrow), but of so brittle a nature, that I could get but very small specimens. Two hours passed swiftly and pleasantly away, and when I returned to the house, I found the Governor in his library, and we soon met to breakfast. On Captain Forbes requesting, that his Excellency would furnish us with the means of visiting Longwood, he declared his intention of accompanying us thither himself, and, if possible, obtaining for us a sight of General Bonaparte.

WHEN Captain Wallis of the Podargus came on board the Zebra, and inquiry was made about General Bonaparte, the captain seemed very unwilling to allow, that he was any longer an object of curiosity at St. Helena, though in England we were all so eager to hear and speak about him. But on landing we found, that his words and actions formed a considerable part of the conversation of all classes. Captain Wallis was first lieutenant to Captain Wright, whose history is well known; and though Bonaparte denies knowing any thing about the torture he is said to have suffered before his death, yet his great wrath at the appointment of Captain Wallis to this station, which, he says, was purposely done to mortify him, shows no very clear conscience. In Captain Wallis he cannot expect to have a sincere friend, unless he conceives him to be a Christian of such consummate piety, that he can forgive and forget all the cruel and insulting treatment which he himself experienced, when taken prisoner with Captain Wright.

Lord Charles Somerset had expressed his wish to Sir Hudson Lowe, that if it were possible, his son might have, if not an interview with, yet an opportunity of seeing General Bonaparte. But unfortunately for us, he was just now not only highly displeased with the Governor and the English in general, on account of some necessary restrictions put upon him, but truly ill with a swelling of the gums, and a breaking out in the lower part of his face, which had confined him to his room for several days. No hopes, therefore, were entertained of seeing him, but I felt as eager to see his dwelling as himself; for though I might not have it in my power to give to my friends a portrait of the fallen hero, I wished to gratify them with a view of his mansion, and the circumjacent country.

Before we set out, Sir Hudson proposed a walk through his own grounds, part of which I had previously seen. His Excellency pointed out many foreign trees, growing here in great perfection, among which, some have not yet been described by botanists. The Chinese yew; the coffee-tree; cinnamon and clove-bushes; the Norfolk-island-pine, a most beautiful species, growing in its native soil to the enormous height of from three hundred and fifty to three hundred and eighty feet; the gum-tree; cabbage-tree; dog-tree, and goble-keer, bearing a small sky-blue flower; and others, deserve particular attention. Some oaks of vast magnitude and spread, form a delightful bower, under which, in that hot climate, one may enjoy the comfort of a shady retreat, inhaling an atmosphere, perfumed by the fragrance of a profusion of the sweetest plants and flowers. We noticed a peculiar kind of grass, called mat-grass, from its spreading most luxuriantly over the ground, in such thickness, that it forms a cover resembling thick matting, with long tendrils like quick-grass. The Governor ordered a large sod, covered with it, to be put into a tub and sent on board, which I brought to England.

The kitchen-gardens are large and well-watered by springs from the adjoining hills. The water is conveyed in narrow troughs, cut in a red lava, easily wrought, by being in a state of half-decomposition. By this means, the water is saved from being lost in the sand, or loose earth, as it passes along. Where this method is practicable, it should be adopted in South Africa, and in other places, for the purpose of irrigation. I am confident, that such a measure would greatly increase the quantity of produce in many South African farms.

We now set out for Longwood: the Governor, Colonel Sir Thomas Reade, Lieutenant Pritchard, Captain Forbes, Mr. Somerset, and I, with a dragoon and groom. Sir Hudson proposed first to ride to Sandy-bay, one of the most romantic spots in the island. The views on all sides are singularly beautiful. Many fertile and well-wooded hills present themselves to the right, one of which is called High Peak. Diana's Peak lies more to the left, and is considered the highest point in the whole island. After crossing several hills and dales, by a zigzag road, their steepness never admitting of a strait line, we reached the ridge, overlooking the bay. The view of the valley is beyond description grand. Hills and rocks of most singular forms surround a deep hollow, within which rises a woody hill with two peaks, one ascending considerably above the other. Between them, surrounded by gardens and shrubberies, lies the elegant villa of Mr. Doveton. He was born in this island, and is one of the members of council. Behind the house, seen, from the place where we stood, between the two peaks, rises a huge rock, like a sugar-loaf, called Lot. In the back-ground, is a range of hills, truly volcanic in their appearance, intersected by numerous glens and gullies, of almost every colour, but chiefly violet, with tinges of yellow, red, dark-brown, and a greenish-grey; the summit of the range is crowned with peaks of brown and black rocks, rising in succession. On its most elevated part, a rock, considerably higher than the rest, and leaning towards the right, has the odd name of Lot's wife; the lower row of rocks of different shapes and sizes, are called Lot's children. The whole landscape is the most strange combination of objects imaginable, and Sir Hudson, perceiving that I wished to make a sketch of it, proposed that I should make it the business of to-morrow, as our time to-day was too short.

Leaving therefore this enchanting spot, we turned towards Longwood, which, after a ride of a few miles, presents itself over a deep, barren glen, called the "Devil's Punch-bowl." General Bonaparte's premises appear, at first sight, to be placed near its rim. After rounding the edge of the Punch-bowl, we reached the outer gate and guard-house. Sir Hudson pointed out to us the situation of Longwood, as peculiarly calculated to prevent unobserved escape. The grounds which occupy a space of about twelve miles in circumference, lie upon a kind of inland peninsula, the only practicable access to which, is between the Devil's Punch-bowl, and a deep glen to the right, descending towards the sea, or between the flag-staff hill, and the other end of the Punch-bowl. Both these roads are sufficiently defended by troops. As far as the guard-house, and within the twelve miles, General Bonaparte may ride, and amuse himself as he pleases; but if he wishes to exceed those limits, an officer must accompany him. He finds this extremely unpleasant, and requested the officer to dress like a common gentleman, which, however, being on duty, the latter was obliged to refuse.

After entering the gate, we rode up to another enclosure, where Sir Hudson desired us to wait, till he had obtained information respecting the General's actual situation. The interior of the premises, is well stocked with ornamental and other trees, forming a pleasant shrubbery, the rest of the domain being principally covered with gum trees standing singly. In a short time, Sir Hudson returned from the house, with an account, that General Bonaparte was very ill with a swelled face and gums, and could not leave his room. This answer we had expected, and contented ourselves with riding about the park, if I may so call it, and obtaining a good idea of the situation of the dwelling of this remarkable man. He and his friends complain of it, but I can only declare, that in the whole island of St. Helena, I have not seen a spot more convenient and airy, and where there is so much opportunity for taking a ride in a carriage or on horseback, without interruption. The park is even and grassy, and General Bonaparte frequently rides out in a cabriolet and six, generally in full gallop. In the shrubbery, near the house, stands a large marquee, in which he commonly breakfasts, and spends a good deal of time.

Bertrand has a separate house, a little lower down the declivity, at a small distance from his master's. We saw him and Monthollon, with their ladies, walking in the park. The mansion itself is rather an assemblage of buildings, than one whole house. The dining-room, with its viranda, is the principal feature, and has three large windows. Connected with it, are General Bonaparte's own apartments, the principal one turning its gable-end towards the entrance. Behind that, if I am correct, follow those of the Captain on guard, Las Casas, Gourgeon, and Monthollon. The latter has four windows. They are all one story high, whitened, with grey roofs.

To the north-east, is a remarkable rock, from its shape called the Barn, rising perpendicularly from the sea to a great height, black, rugged, and without any trees. Farther inland, lies a peaked hill, called the Flag-staff. Towards the Barn descends a narrow vale, covered with gravel of decomposed volcanic matter, in some parts so red, that it furnishes the imagination with the idea of a burning torrent. Here and there are patches of blue, yellow, and violet, increasing the deception. We had no time to fatigue our horses by riding into it; and on our return to the guard-house, Sir Hudson very obligingly directed his adjutant, Lieutenant Pritchard to attend me to any place, from which I might wish to make a sketch of the house and premises. He then returned home, Captain Forbes and Sir Thomas Reade rode to James-town, and Mr. Somerset favoured me with his company.

We went round the north-east end of the Punch-bowl, through the camp of the 53d regiment, but finding no good situation for a view, turned back towards the opposite height. Not far from the gate, I dismounted, and got a good general view of the house, or houses.

When we arrived at Plantation-house, Lady Lowe had taken an airing in a close carriage, and was in the drawing-room, where we were introduced to her. Her Ladyship likewise attended to-day at the head of her table. Some military and other gentlemen joined us at dinner, My neighbour was Colonel Listef, who having been in the interior of South Africa, as commander of a corps of Hottentots, had visited Gnadenthal, and was interested in obtaining an account of the present state of the Mission. The afternoon could not be but pleasantly spent in the company of men so well informed and intelligent. After they were gone, I retired into my own room, and finished my memorandums.

30th. I rose early, and began my morning's walk by a scramble up the hill to the right, to obtain a general view of the house and premises; then turning through the gates, went down the hill on the road to Longwood. High-knole, with its fort, supported by steep, black, rugged, rocks, only wants trees to make it appear a very picturesque object. Francis-plain camp lies in a very solitary situation. But I have seldom listened with more pleasure to military music, than this morning, though performed only by some fifes, and a smaller and larger drum. The composition, as well as the performance, were excellent. I returned through the gates, and, ascending by the zigzag walks behind the house, to the church-yard adjoining the chapel of ease, a good view of a range of hills from the Governor's grounds to the Barn rock, rewarded my labours.

At breakfast, Sir Hudson proposed, that Mr. Somerset should make another attempt at Longwood, by the good offices of Dr. O'Meara, to see General Bonaparte. I set out in company of Lieutenant Pritchard, for Sandy-bay, taking a different route from that of yesterday. We made halt at a guard-house and flag-staff, and having given our horses in charge of a lad, got over a wall, and obtained a fine view of the valley, but not equal to that from the other side, towards which, therefore, we bent our course. Here I attempted to take a very accurate view of this singular spot.

From hence we made a circuit towards the western coast of the island, passing along a sharp ridge, with beautiful glens on each side, in which several gentlemen's houses and plantations are well contrasted with the rugged masses of rock in their neighbourhood, and the wild waste around them. Yet even this waste was gloriously decorated with bushes of most luxuriant growth, chiefly of furze, now in full bloom, and both in the size and colour of its flowers, incomparably superior to that of Europe. Blackberry-bushes, likewise, which were first introduced as a rarity in a garden, have now become so plentiful, that they are considered as the worst of weeds, intruding themselves everywhere into gardens and plantations. The summits of some of the hills are crowned with groves of gum and cabbage-trees, but the havock made of the wood, with which this island was formerly clothed, has been such, that, comparatively, but little of it is left. Formerly every passing ship sent men on shore to cut as much as they wanted. Of course no care was taken to prevent waste. The subsequent introduction of goats, which ran wild, and multiplied very fast, was most ruinous to the growth of young plants and sprouts. These creatures proved at last so great a nuisance, that they were hunted, and almost destroyed. There are no quadrupeds here, which may be called aborigines. Rats and mice have been brought hither by ships. Of other creatures, except birds and reptiles, we have no account. Scorpions and centipedes are said to have always abounded.

The houses of the English settlers in St. Helena, are very different in their appearance from those of the Dutch at the Cape. They are neat and cleanly, with lawns and plantations; and prove, that their possessors, whither richer or poorer, are directed by some good taste, and do not always first ask, whether what they build or plant, will bring in money, or afford too much pleasure or convenience to a neighbour, without gain or reward to themselves.

The views on the western shore are equally interesting, though not so wild. Roseberry hill, the villa of Colonel Smith, is charmingly situated. A singular rock, from its shape, called the Friar, and giving name to a valley, presents itself between two huge masses of stone, about the north-west corner of the island. We had no time to approach nearer. The heat was to-day greater than we had experienced it for a long time. The Governor could not have given me a more agreeable companion than Lieutenant Pritchard, who made it his study to render my ride agreeable and instructive.

After our return, I found his Excellency in the library, busily engaged in preparing dispatches to go by the Zebra. My view of the house and surrounding scenery happening to meet with Lady Lowe's approbation, I finished my sketch for her. Captain Forbes had returned from James-town, and Dr. O'Meara having sent word, that General Bonaparte was too ill to appear abroad, Mr. Somerset was disappointed. Mr. Brook, the Secretary, paid a short visit. We sat down to dinner without any additional guests, and the afternoon was spent in lively conversation.

Every account we heard of the disposition and conduct of General Bonaparte in this island, showed but little of that greatness of character, which he would affect, and his admirers represent as inherent in him. That which belongs to the natural construction of a man's mind will be discovered in every situation of life. Not only in prosperity, but in adversity, it will cleave to him, and generally influence his conduct. But in a day of ease and victory, it is much easier, to support a pretence, and wear a mask, than in a state of affliction. While General Bonaparte was dictating laws to every nation but England, and crowned heads were bowing before him, he could assume a character superior to his own, and affect, in every thing, to rise higher than other men. It would be unjust to deny him the merit of having exhibited a degree of comprehension and skill in military affairs, which has perhaps seldom, if ever, been equalled among ancient or modern warriors. In civil arrangements, also, who will deny, that his plans were vast, and that he had the wisdom to search out and employ the best agents for the accomplishment of his designs! Had these properties of his mind been accompanied and directed by what constitutes true greatness, by generosity, goodness of heart, a conscientious principle, and religious attention to justice and truth in his dealings, he would indeed have deserved all the praise bestowed upon him, either by those who were dazzled by his meteoric splendor, or by men, who in our own country, set him up, more, I trust, to please their party, than to sound the trumpet, and further the designs of the most determined and illiberal enemy England ever had. But now we see, that in adversity, that species of greatness, which he possessed, will not support him. It cannot indeed be supposed, that he should feel happy in his present situation, and I could not visit his present domain, without feeling pity for a man, fallen so low, and who, had his senses not forsaken him in that (to him) most evil hour, might yet, after all his defeats, by honestly yielding to necessity, and signing the proposed treaty of Chaumont, have been left in possession of more power and military glory, than any other Potentate in Europe. But the old adage, "Quem Deus vult perdere, prius dementat," was never more completely verified, than in the case of this singular man. He was, no doubt, an instrument in the hands of a just God, to chastise the nations for their apostacy, and laid aside, when his work was done. If any thing tends to lessen or destroy that compassion, which one must feel even for the greatest delinquent, under the lash of well-merited punishment, it is that petulance and irritability, which he shows in his present situation, and which a mind truly great would know how to suppress.

Ever grumbling, finding fault with every person and every thing about him, dissatisfied with his food, peevishly complaining of neglect, when circumstances alone perhaps produced some transient disappointment, and, if not the author, yet the promoter of the most unjust accusations against Sir Hudson Lowe, the Governor, who, though he knows and does his duty to his Sovereign, in guarding the charge committed to him, has, in more than one instance, spared and befriended his prisoner! can such conduct proceed from what is called greatness of mind! I will quote one instance of the effect of his dissatisfaction about things of minor importance, which came to my knowledge from the best authority. A butcher at James-town, who used to deliver meat for his table, being at length wearied out with continual repetition of complaints, though he furnished the best meat he could procure, directed the following laconic epistle to the Governor: "Sir Hudson! May it please your Excellency, this same General Bonaparte is hard to please. I begs to be excused sarving him any longer with meat."

As he hates Sir Hudson Lowe, the latter does not unnecessarily trouble him with his presence, but delivers all notices to him by Sir Thomas Reade, whose polished manners, good-humoured disposition, and knowledge of the Italian language, which General Bonaparte is said to prefer to French in conversation, makes him a pleasant messenger. Sir Thomas has therefore had more opportunities of becoming acquainted with him in the various affections of his mind, than most Englishmen, with whom he has conversed.

A proof of great meanness is this, that he will not give credit to the English for any great warlike action. He says, that by all the rules of war, he ought to have gained the battle of Waterloo, and that the Duke of Wellington ought, if he had been a good General, to have retreated, and not made his stand where he did. Yet at other times, feeling peculiarly indignant at the Prussians, he, of course, will not allow them to have had any share in the result of that action, but describes his defeat to the firmness of the English infantry alone, by which all his plans were disconcerted.

It is not my intention to add to the numberless accounts given of this celebrated captive, who thinks that he has friends and defenders enough among the English nation. Not having seen and spoken with him myself, I can only repeat what has been said by others, and as to those communications, which are made in the course of friendly and unguarded conversation, I am of opinion, that, without special permission, common civility requires, that they should not be published, lest by any unintentional mistake ment, uneasiness might be created in the minds of men, whose kindness and liberality deserve to be rewarded with the most scrupulous attention to their feelings.

General Bonaparte once observed to a gentleman, at whose house he seemed to bear his lot with considerable composure, that so many extraordinary things had happened to him in his life, which had happened to no other man, that he should not be surprised, if some time hence the English Government were to recal him.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Preparations to leave St. Helena. Rumours of a war between England and Algiers. Exercises at great guns and small arms. Appearance of Ascension island. Singular colouring of its rocks and hills. Captain Rich of the Racoon sloop of war. Landing. Great mountain. Volcanic scorice and cinders. Scanty supply of water. Lava. Obsidien. Spotted crabs. Coxcomb oysters. Broken shells. Beautiful moon-light view. Water-spout. Remarks on reading the history of Greece and Rome. Strange noises on board. Character of my late Father. Conversations with Captain Forbes. Stormy weather. Accuracy of reckoning by the chronometer. Enter the British Channel. Arrival at Spithead.

OCTOBER 31st. Captain Forbes, on his return from town, yesterday, informed us, that he should sail in the forenoon, and we prepared to leave this hospitable mansion, which, but for the strong drawing felt towards home, I should have done with the most sensible regret. Determined, however, to lose no time, I was ready for my morning's walk before sunrise, and having found a good road to the top of the hill above the cave, I once more treated myself with a general view of this lovely spot and the surrounding country, and entering the cave, made a drawing of Plantation-house, and the chapel of ease above it; after which, I once more examined the heap of stones in the garden, and got some good specimens of volcanic scorïæ.

After breakfast, Captain Forbes rode to town, Mr. Somerset and I followed, and in about an hour, Sir Hudson and his retinue. We alighted at Sir Thomas Reade's, and finding that we could not immediately go on board, Captain Forbes and Mr. Somerset rode up Rupert's hill, to pay a visit to Mr. Balcombe. I intended to write one or two letters to be sent to the Cape, but the servant having locked the room at the Admiral's house, where I had deposited my writing apparatus, I took a walk a little way up Ladderhill, and back to the jetty, intending to proceed along the rocks, to the arch I had observed on our landing, but found it inaccessible by land.

On the Captain's return, we went with Sir Thomas to the castle, to take leave of the Governor. The castle is an old building, possessing no beauty or peculiar feature. It lies to the left, on entering the gate from the jetty. Having expressed to his Excellency, as well as to Sir Thomas and the other officers, the grateful sense we shall ever retain of that kind attention which we had so largely experienced, we entered the Captain's gig, and went on board. Sir Thomas took charge of our letters, an opportunity soon offering for the Cape. But if the plan of obtaining provisions from the Portuguese settlements of Angola and Benguela on the opposite coast of Africa, succeeds, the communication between St. Helena and the Cape will not be so frequent. The loss in live stock imported from the Cape, is found to be too great. We had a good and swift passage, and yet lost twenty of our sheep, and not long ago, out of thirty brought from the Cape for the use of the officers, nine-and-twenty died during the voyage.

The weather was fine, the sea smooth, and the wind as fair as we could wish. We had been threatened with a repetition of a fit of sea-sickness, after spending three days on shore, but felt no symptoms of that unpleasant malady. St. Helena remained in sight all day, and for some hours we could see Longwood through an opening behind the Barn-rock. In the evening, the moon shone bright, and we sat long on deck.

Of our fellow-passengers, only Captain Crawford and Lieutenant Keeling had been on shore. The former complained sadly of the expense he had been put to at a tavern. Lieutenant Keeling had been in camp with the fifty-third regiment, called with Dr. O'Meara on Bertrand, and walked over the grounds at Longwood.

November 1st. We had entirely lost sight of St. Helena, and were gently gliding along towards the island of Ascension. Having got rid of General Bonaparte's goods, our decks were clear, and we had room to walk two abreast from the wheel to the ladder. Having been informed, that we were at war with the Algerines, our valiant tars conceived good hopes, that we should "have a brush" with some of them.

In the afternoon the Captain ordered a general exercise of great guns and small arms, without firing.

2d. A target being fixed at the end of the fore-top-sail-yard, the marines and artillery-men fired at it. A general exercise took place. The whole operation of calling the men to quarters, mustering at the guns, each officer taking his particular station, was put in practice; firing with great guns; boarding; resisting boarders; extinguishing fire; falling down to avoid raking broadsides; jumping up to fire; &c. The manœuvres were directed by the captain, unexpectedly, as he thought fit, and the men seemed to go through their work with great spirit. The whole represented a naval engagement, and was to me a very entertaining exhibition. In the sequel, this exercise was frequently repeated.

4th. Every preparation was made, and I was informed, that in case of an attack, in a few minutes we might be ready for the fight. For some days past, I had perceived a slight pain in my left leg, which to-day increased, with some swelling. I submitted it to the surgeon's inspection, who pronounced it to be of not much consequence, and gave me a lotion, which I believe was of service, though the pain haunted me for some time. The clouds seemed to announce a change of weather, and the wind freshened; for which we were thankful. Some showers passed over us in the afternoon.

6th. At breakfast, the master announced land from the mast-head, and in about an hour after, we could discern it from on deck. Running with a fine breeze, at the rate of eight knots an hour, we hoped to cast anchor at the island of Ascension, early in the afternoon.

Most of the officers on board saw this island for the first time. We expected to see a low, flat, uninteresting country, noted merely as a resort for turtles; and were therefore agreeably disappointed, when, at a distance of forty miles, we beheld an outline, much more varied and picturesque than that of St. Helena, and the volcanic origin more perceptible. Sailing along the coast from the south-east, the whole island appeared dreary in the extreme. The sandy beach was as white as snow, with black, rugged rocks interspersed. Behind it, a horrid waste, with black gullies between the hillocks. The latter differed in height, and seemed chiefly heaps of scoriæ, of a conical form, one set up above the other, and enclosing higher hills of a dark-brown colour. A high mountain rising in the centre of the island, showed three peaks. A black cloud rested upon it for some time, and is said generally to obscure the summit, but we were favoured with so clear a sky, that the cloud, though hovering above, seldom descended upon it.

One headland after the other presented itself, as we ran down; and no vessel being seen for some time, the Captain began to entertain doubts, respecting the situation of the anchoring ground, as pointed out in Hosburgh's Directory. At length, the masts of the Raccoon sloop of war were discovered rising behind a promontory, but more to the westward than expected. Various signals were made and answered from a signal-house on one of the hills, by which the arrival of the Zebra was announced to the Racoon.

Some of the strata of the rocks along the coast are singular, both as to form and colour. They lie chiefly horizontally, or dipping a little towards the south, in some places in curved lines. The colours generally follow each other downwards thus: blueish-black; dark-brown; light-red; yellow; grey; earthy; and white, near the beach. All seem to consist of a rotten, crumbling stone. Not a green spot is to be seen. The whole island is a huge mass of cinders and hardened lava.

Large flights of the frigate-bird, and other sea-fowl, kept hovering about the ship.

On doubling the point, we saw Captain Rich of the Racoon, coming towards us in his boat. He was soon on board, and directed us where to cast anchor. We did not arrive at the anchoring-place till seven P. M. and after a late dinner, Captain Forbes accompanied Captain Rich on board the Racoon.

7th. Though I felt a considerable degree of pain in my left leg, and the surgeon advised my staying on board, yet in so extraordinary a situation, in view of one of the most remarkable islands in the Atlantic, encouraged by the finest weather, with little wind and surf, and every convenience for landing, I hope I may be forgiven for disregarding the surgeon's advice; nor blamed as presumptuous, in venturing, at the risk of a little increase of pain, to visit a place of such an inviting character. Captain Forbes and Captain Crawford went to breakfast on board the Racoon, but the gig was ordered to attend Mr. Somerset and me.

To land on the sandy beach, even when the surf is least violent, would be attended with great danger. The only safe way is to back the boat into some cove between rocks, and as the swell heaves its stern towards the rock, without touching, to leap on shore.

On landing, some people showed us to Lieutenant Roberts's tent. This officer had the command on shore, in the absence of Captain Rich. The tents of the garrison are placed among heaps of volcanic matter, resembling cinder-heaps in the neighbourhood of London. Every hill, both near the coast and in the interior, consists of the same substance, chiefly of a deeper or lighter brown colour. Some look yellow and violet. At a distance, the brown tints change to a deep purple. On the great mountain, the colour is a blueish-grey, with greenish spots owing to the growth of a species of milk-bush, here called parsley, and considered poisonous. The white colour of some of the rocks seems to proceed from calcareous substances.

We were informed by the officers, that there may be about twenty acres in the island fit for cultivation. They have made a garden on the great mountain, but they must fetch their supply of garden-stuff, turf for firing, and fresh water, from a distance of from seven to nine miles. No tree is to be seen throughout the whole island. Two small springs of fresh water are known, the nearest, seven miles from the tents. But it is rather a continual dropping from a rock, than a regular spring, and yields two tons in twenty-four hours. The second is at the garden, near the summit of the great mountain, nine miles distant from the battery, and in the same space of time, yields one hundred and forty gallons. As our water on board sent forth a very unpleasant smell, and could not be used, the sweet water of this island was considered by us as a great luxury.

The two naval Captains having joined us on shore, we took a walk with Lieutenant Roberts towards the spring, but the heat was so great, being 115 degrees Fahrenheit by one, and 122 by another thermometer, and the sand, or rather powdered cinders, so troublesome to the feet, that after forcing ourselves forward for about two miles, we were obliged to return. In all directions, nothing but the most barren and desolate region met our view. It appeared as if the tremendous eruption, by which this island has been raised from the depths of the ocean, had but lately ceased.

When we had regained the coast, the Captains returned on board. Mr. Somerset walked with me to the battery and store-houses, and along the coast, examining the rocks. They are a black lava, full of pores, cavities, and crevices. Innumerable spotted crabs crawled about them, and many of the cavities were filled with cockscomb oyster-shells, which stuck so fast, that it was with difficulty I obtained one whole specimen. In some places, the rocks are covered with a vitreous matter, like glazing. Lieutenant Roberts presented me with several large lumps of obsidian, or volcanic glass, found in the interior.

The sand on the beach consists chiefly, and I may almost say, wholly, of fragments of small shells, among which were several broken parts of beautiful varieties of a larger sort, but not one of them left whole.

There are no animals on the island but wild goats, and numberless rats, which proved very troublesome to our people. Lieutenant Roberts having showed us the officers' tents and mess-room, carried us on board the Zebra in his boat, where we found several of the officers of the Racoon on a visit to those of our vessel.

The establishment at Ascension, was made in consequence of General Bonaparte's confinement in St. Helena, and under an apprehension, that unless we took formal possession of this island, some other power, or adventurer, might make it a stepping-stone to forward his escape.

The sun shone in full splendor, and illumined the whole island. It is a beautiful object, as far as outline and colouring are concerned. One would not imagine that nature's pencil could give such effect to so desolate a spot. I endeavoured to obtain an exact sketch of the whole coast, before which we lay, and as the cloud had entirely withdrawn from the great mountain, nothing was wanted to render it complete. The colours were inimitably beautiful, and as the sun began to decline, almost every shade of red, brown, purple, lilac, blueish-grey, yellow, orange, black, and white, was produced, in one or other part of the landscape.

About four o'clock, the two Captains, Mr. Somerset, and I, went on board the Racoon to dinner. She is a very handsome ship, large for her class, rated at eighteen guns, but carrying twenty-six, with a roomy cabin, state-room, and quarter-galleries.

A boat having been sent to some distance, to procure fish for Captain Forbes, we were detained on board till long after sunset, when Captain Rich accompanied us on board the Zebra, in his own boat. The anchor was now discovered to be foul, and it lasted a considerable time, before we were disengaged, and could set sail. At length, the buoy-rope being cut, we launched forth. I had meanwhile enjoyed the pleasure of long contemplating one of the finest nocturnal views ever seen. The peaks of the great mountain were enveloped in black clouds, of threatening aspect, but appearing stationary. The full moon distinctly showed the whole outline of the island, illumining the edges of the many loose airy clouds, which, disengaging themselves from the grand mass, by degrees spread over the heavens. The Racoon in the foreground, with the play of the distant surf and of the nearer waves, enlightened by the moon's rays, added greatly to the enchanting beauty of the scene. As the wind rose with the increase of clouds, we did not carry much sail during the night.

10th. Being Sunday, the Captain read prayers on deck. The service was conducted with the greatest order and solemnity. Immediately after, a strange sail was announced, which proved to be a large merchantman, coming from the east-ward, and standing athwart our course. This is the first vessel we have seen at sea, since we left the Cape.

15th. Porpoises and albigores were frequently about the ship, and by the appearance of the clouds, calms and squalls were expected. A heavy shower overtook us about noon, and the sailors gained a good deal of fresh water for washing.

16th. A water-spout appeared in the south-west, the course of which we watched for some time, but it passed a great way astern of us. The south-east trade-wind had remained steady and fair, to this day, but after a violent shower at noon, it suddenly fell calm, and we began to fear, that we had got into the region of calms and squalls. But in about an hour's time, a breeze sprung up from the north-east, which continued fair and strong.

21st. Some showers passed over us. Every preparation was made for any unforeseen event, in reference to the war with the Algerines. Blue lights were got ready, and shot brought on deck.

22d. A merchant ship hove in sight, and a square-rigged vessel was seen to windward. Boxes of case and grape-shot were brought on deck. About noon, a sea-man fell from the fore-top, and bruised his head exceedingly. The loss of his services was much regretted, as he was a remarkably clever and active man, and captain of the top.

23d. Captain Forbes and I have been lately, at our leisure, reading Goldsmith's compendium of the histories of Greece and Rome, which Mr. Somerset had brought with him. I cannot divest myself of the party-feelings I had, when a boy at school. I then took a dislike to the character of the Romans, and always wished success to their enemies, more especially to Hannibal. Goldsmith's great admiration of them therefore did not accord with my sentiments. But the history of Rome is peculiarly instructive to an Englishman, and he may thereby learn, what real enemies of the happiness of mankind all demagogues have ever been, however plausible their pretences.

25th. This morning, about four o'clock, the sky being covered with dark clouds, and the moon set, a ship coming from the eastward, approached us within two cable-lengths. She hoisted lights, but the night was so dark, that she was not immediately perceived by the men on the look-out. By God's providence, she did not run foul of us, which, as she was coming in full sail, and right before the wind, might have proved a serious injury to both vessels. The wind freshened towards evening, and we ran at the rate of from eight and a half to ten knots an hour.

26th. In sleepless nights, I was both disturbed and amused by the various noises on board a ship of war. First, the centinel before our door cried, Log-time! The officer of the watch on-deck: Heave the log! Hold the reel! Shortly after: Strike the bell! The Zebra's bell, however, being broken when she went on shore in Simon's bay, it sounded like an old tin kettle, till the broken piece fell out, by which its tone was improved. This lasted about a fortnight, when by some means it got another crack, and lost its voice entirely. As make-shifts are very common among sailors, they found, on trial, that striking with the hammer on the flook of the anchor, answered the purpose as well, and that was now our bell. It is struck every half hour, but not in imitation of a clock. The day is divided into six parts. At twelve at noon, it strikes eight times, or eight bells, as the phrase is, two and two strokes distinct, „ . „ . „ . at half after twelve, one stroke; at one, two strokes; at half-past one, three; and so on till four o'clock; when, of course, the eight strokes return. Then, beginning with one at half past eight o'clock, they are again complete at twelve. If the officer says to the Captain, it is twelve or six o'clock, the answer is, "make it so." When the King was sailing in a frigate at Weymouth, hearing the commander use that expression, he observed: "You, Sir, have more power than I have; I cannot make it what time I please." After the bell has struck, the sailors placed as watch on the shrouds, and fore-castle, cry out, as loud as they can, lest they should be suspected of sleeping: Larboard quarter; Starboard quarter; Larboard bow. In the morning, there is pumping, scrubbing, trampling overhead, and the noise increases.

27th. The wind was variable with short calms, and much lightning.

29th. It may seem impertinent, that I again introduce a memorial of my late father on this anniversary of his death, having already in my account of the same day, spent at sea, on my voyage to the Cape, expressed my feelings on that subject; but as I wrote this journal for the perusal of my children, I could not help adding a few lines in reference to it; and now, on revision, cannot resolve to omit them, requesting the indulgence of such, to whom they may appear obtrusive.

I have seen and known some persons, who possessed one or other quality of my father's mind and heart, in an equal, and, perhaps, superior degree; but never any man, in whom so many excellent and useful qualifications were combined. In his conversation with those, over whom the situation he held in our Church had placed him, he understood the rare art of gaining their esteem and respect, and even securing perfect submission to his superior judgment, without ever, in the least degree, appealing to his station or authority! He was open and communicative, heard patiently the opinions of others, though differing from his own; received their instructions, when needed, and felt no hesitation in confessing, that he had been guided by the judgment of an inferior in situation and ability. He was the friend of all, and from the lowest to the highest, all felt at ease in his company. 'The lowest' placed confidence in his sincerity, as addressing a man, attentive to and interested in his concerns, and ever willing to advise and assist. Again, I might quote many instances, in which even the King's ministers treated him with marked regard and attention, honouring the uprightness of his heart, and the nobleness of his spirit. In conversing with inferiors, he had nothing of that affectation of condescension, which generally proves a cobweb too thin to hide the pride lurking beneath; and before men in power, his courteousness partook of nothing like fear or cringing. As a man of strong feelings, he may have felt strong partialities; but he never suffered them to interfere with his judgment, nor did I ever hear him express dislike, much less resentment, against any individual, not even against a few, who treated him ill. Though strong in his declarations of abhorrence against vice, and especially against untruth and insincerity, he never directed his displeasure against the sinner, but only against the sin. As a peace-maker, he possessed an extraordinary talent, and it was ever his heart's delight, to bring about reconciliation and good-will. God's blessing attended his labours of love, and what seemed incurable hatred, was often changed into perfect friendship, through his mediation.

In disinterested devotedness to the cause, to which he had dedicated his talents and his life, he set a noble example to all in public stations of every description. He never sought worldly advantage, either for himself or his family, in any thing he undertook. But for the temporal as well as spiritual welfare of others, he was at all times ready to use his influence and best exertions.

In native eloquence, improved by study, we have never seen his equal in our Church, and those who have heard him in the pulpit, will grant, that his pre-eminence over most preachers in his day, was great. His language flowed with such ease, that, even when he raised his audience to the highest enjoyment of the most sublime and rapturous subjects, it was perfectly intelligible to all classes, without ever descending into what might be considered too colloquial or vulgar. His manner was always luminous, powerful, and full of fine imagery, explanatory of the subject before him.

In setting forth the great doctrines of Christianity, of the depravity and helplessness of man, the necessity and all-sufficiency of the atonement made by Jesus Christ, justification by faith, and the hope of glory, he spoke with an energy and unction, which never failed to arrest attention, and touch the heart.

Being possessed of a soul truly musical, while he encouraged the use and practice of music in the church, by every means within his reach, he resisted all innovation, tending to destroy the grandeur and simplicity of the true church-style, and his remarks on that part of the service were most judicious.

In his whole deportment was seen, what a combination of natural talent diligently improved, sweetness of temper, and the grace and love of God in the heart, may effect.

There are now but few remaining, to whom I may appeal for the truth of this account of my dear and honoured father. He wished on his death-bed, that nothing might be said of him, for he thought it wrong to give any praise to man, when the whole was due to God; yet we may be allowed to thank God for sending such a servant, to benefit his cause on earth, and express our heart-felt regret, that he was so soon removed, for he had not yet completed his fifty-ninth year.

The cause of his death was an excrescence in the vitals, of the nature of a common wen, which, had it gathered in any external part, according to the opinion of the surgeons, might have been removed without much, if any pain.

May my end, whenever it pleases God to call me hence, be like his, as full of peace and assurance of eternal bliss, through the merits of my Redeemer.

30th. We were to-day in the latitude of Corvo, one of the Azores, but too far to the westward to see it. The wind was rather high, and the sea turbulent. I finished reading Goldsmith's history of Greece. Both that, and his history of Rome are excellent, luminous compendiums. They show what the boasted pretensions of man are, without the influence of the Spirit of God. Can there be any thing more diabolical than the conduct of these people, once the most enlightened of mankind by the powers of human reason.

December 1st. Advent-Sunday. I read with peculiar delight the portions of Scripture appointed in our Church for this day, and was in spirit among those, who with heart and voice sing "Hosanna, blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." In a conversation with the Captain this evening, I was led to express my thoughts concerning the present mode of education in the world, which, in general, rather forbids, than "suffers little children to come to Jesus," though not from the same generous, but mistaken views, which made His disciples consider them troublesome. But it is said, that if men are to live in the world, and to be a match for it, they ought to be made acquainted with its ways in early youth, and not brought up too religiously. I sometimes thought, that by the care taken to preserve me from the ways, lusts, fashions, and ensnaring pleasures of the world, I had missed much; but from what I have seen, since it has been in my power, to know more of the world, I find I have no cause to regret my very late acquaintance with it, having still to learn, where the great happiness, so much boasted of, is to be found; and as I wish myself and every human creature to be completely happy, I pray, that we all may find the true and only source of that joy, which, as our Saviour expressed it, "no man can take from us," and which, through Him, may become the portion of us all.

2d. The sea was restless, and the ship pitched heavily. In the afternoon, the breeze freshened, and the spray kept flying over the bulwarks, and on to the quarter deck. The sky looked wild, and we took in sail.

3d. I did not feel well, but went on deck to behold the sea, which appeared rather furious. Mighty waves assailed us on all sides, and every precaution was taken. During the forenoon, we sprung our main-yard, and ran under close-reefed top-sails. The wind getting more aft, the ship began to roll very much. The hatchways were closed, and tarpawlings put upon the sky-light of the cabin; but we were proceeding fast in the right track. The clouds in the west had long looked very black, and now rose with lightning and thunder, and a heavy squall. All hands were turned up, as a severe gale was expected. I retreated into my cabin. Both this and the following day, the weather was very boisterous and rainy.

5th. Though "well roused about," as the sailors call it, and not able to sleep, I was truly thankful for the swiftness with which we were approaching our dear native country. Surely the mercies of the Lord have been every morning new. Not a blast of contrary wind have we had since we left the Cape, and this morning, just when we wanted it, the wind shifted to the north-west, and we ran at the rate of twelve knots for several hours. All hands were employed in getting out a spar to fish the main-yard. In these operations, the artillery-men are of great service, and work with cheerfulness. The waves rose higher to-day, than I had ever yet seen, and it was a great amusement to me to watch the ship's passage over them.

6th. We had proceeded swiftly and steadily during the night. About eight in the morning, it began to blow what even the sailors called a hard gale. But the sky was perfectly clear and the sun shone upon the boisterous ocean with great brightness. The waves seemed to roll in upon us like mountains. The royal masts were struck, and we ran under close-reefed top-sails and a storm stay-sail. During the forenoon, the Captain was making great exertions to get up the main-yard, which had been fished yesterday, but was obliged to give it up till four in the afternoon, when the wind abated a little.

7th. We were now in the chops of the Channel; and in the afternoon, on sounding, found ourselves in ninety-eight fathom water. Our calculations by the chronometer have been so correct, that we were exactly where it was supposed we should be. We sounded every four hours during the night.

8th. The morning set in with a heavy squall, but in our favour. During the forenoon, showers passed over us. I was amused with observing the sand cleaving to the bottom of the lead. The most minute shells, among which were star-fish not above a quarter of an inch in diameter, were brought up from a depth of from eighty to sixty fathoms.

About two o'clock, a fishing-boat came to us. The man brought two newspapers. We were sorry to hear of some serious disturbances in several parts of England. We learnt also, that a severe engagement had taken place between the English and Algerines, in which our countrymen were victorious; and that, during a dreadful storm, about three weeks ago, many ships had been wrecked in the Channel.

9th. In the afternoon, we saw the Lizard point, and entered the Channel with a gentle breeze at north-west. About midnight, the wind changed to south-west, increasing in strength. We ran at the rate of nine and ten knots an hour, and though it began to grow hazy with drizzling rain, discovered the different promontories, as we passed swiftly along. About four miles to the westward of the Isle of Wight, a pilot-boat hove in sight, and a gun being fired to bring her to, the pilot soon came on board. All crowded around him to hear the news. He gave an account of Lord Exmouth's victory, and the submission of the Dey of Algiers. With a fine steady breeze, we crossed the bridge between the Needles and the main land, over which the sea plays in a terrible manner, and reached the anchorage at Cowes about six in the evening. During the night it blew hard, and we were thankful to be in safety.

10th. Early, we weighed, and about eight A. M. anchored at Spithead. The Captain, Mr. Somerset, and I, went on shore in the gig, and landed at the Sally Port. Mr. Somerset set out from Portsmouth for the Duke of Beaufort's seat, and I took leave of Captain Forbes with sentiments of the greatest esteem and gratitude, nor shall I ever forget the kindness experienced from him during the whole voyage. The evening after our arrival, it blew a terrible gale. While I heard the tempest roaring without, I cannot express in words my thankfulness to God, for the extraordinary success, which attended us during the voyage, and for having been brought in safety to shore, even at a season, when storms are most dreaded.

13th. I left Portsmouth, and in the evening arrived safe in London, where I found my young friend Adolph, who had but that day landed from the Brilliant. Thus Lord Charles Somerset's hopes were verified; for, though I left the Cape a month and a day later than the Brilliant, I landed in England three days sooner than I should have done, had I sailed with that vessel.
